

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. ROLL
IN THE
THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

63 VICTORIÆ 1900.

MEM.—According to the Usage of Parliament, when the House appoints a Select Committee, the Lords appointed to serve upon it are named in the Order of their Rank, beginning with the Highest; and so, when the House sends a Committee to a Conference with the Commons, the Lord highest in Rank is called first, and the rest go forth in like Order: But when the Whole House is called over for any Purpose, within the House, or for the Purpose of proceeding forth to Westminster Hall, or upon any public Solemnity, the Call begins invariably with the Junior Baron.

ELECTIONS—Ordered, That all Members who are returned for two or more places in any part of the United Kingdom do make their election for which of the places they will serve, within one week after it shall appear that there is no question upon the return for that place ; and if anything shall come in question touching the return or election of any Member, he is to withdraw during the time the matter is in debate ; and that all Members returned upon double returns do withdraw till their returns are determined. Resolved, That no Peer of the Realm, except such Peers of Ireland as shall for the time being be actually elected, and shall not have declined to serve, for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, hath any right to give his vote in the election of any Member to serve in Parliament ... 54

Motion made and Question proposed—

“That it is a high infringement of the liberties and privileges of the Commons of the United Kingdom for any Lord of Parliament, or other Peer or Prelate, not being a Peer of Ireland at the time elected, and not having declined to serve for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, to concern himself in the election of Members to serve for the Commons in Parliament, except only any Peer of Ireland, at such elections in Great Britain respectively, where such Peer shall appear as a candidate, or by himself, or any others, be proposed to be elected ; or for any Lord Lieutenant or Governor of any county to avail himself of any authority derived from his commission, to influence the election of any Member to serve for the Commons in Parliament.”—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Amendment proposed—

“To leave out the words from the word ‘kingdom,’ in line 2, to the word ‘for,’ in line 8.”—(Mr. James Lowther.)

The House divided :—Ayes, 337 ; Noes, 101. (Division List, No. 1.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That it is a high infringement of the liberties and privileges of the Commons of the United Kingdom for any Lord of Parliament, or other Peer or Prelate, not being a Peer of Ireland at the time elected, and not having declined to serve for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, to concern himself in the election of Members to serve for the Commons in Parliament, except only any Peer of Ireland, at such elections in Great Britain respectively where such Peer shall appear as a candidate, or by himself, or any others, be proposed to be elected ; or for any Lord Lieutenant or Governor of any county to avail himself of any authority derived from his commission, to influence the election of any Member to serve for the Commons in Parliament.

IN THE

SEVENTH SESSION OF THE TWENTY-SIXTH PARLIAMENT OF THE
HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

THE SEVENTH SESSION OF THE FOURTEENTH PARLIAMENT of Her Majesty the Queen, and the Twenty-sixth Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, was opened by Commission at Two of the clock.

The Lords Commissioners were:—
The LORD CHANCELLOR (the Earl of
count Cross), the LORD CHAMBERLAIN
(the Earl of Hopetoun), the EARL of KINTORE, and Lord BELPER.

The Commons being at the Bar with their Speaker, the LORD CHANCELLOR delivered Her Majesty's Speech to both Houses of Parliament, as follows:—

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The peace which had recently been broken in South Africa when last I addressed you has unhappily not been restored; but otherwise my relations with other States are friendly.

"In resisting the invasion of my South African Colonies by the South African
VOL. LXXVIII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Republic and by the Orange Free State my people have responded with devotion and enthusiasm to the appeal which I have made to them; and the heroism of my soldiers in the field, and of my sailors and marines who were landed to cooperate with them, has not fallen short of the noblest traditions of our military history. I am deeply grieved that so many valuable lives should have fallen a sacrifice. But I have witnessed with pride and with the heartiest gratification the patriotic eagerness and spontaneous loyalty with which my subjects in all parts of my dominions have come forward to share in the common defence of their Imperial interests. I am confident that I shall not look to them in vain when I exhort them to sustain and renew their exertions until they have brought this struggle for the maintenance of the Empire and the assertion of its supremacy in South Africa to a victorious conclusion.

"A treaty has been concluded with the German Emperor for the adjustment of rights claimed by the two countries in Samoa, Tonga, and other islands in the Pacific. To a portion of these stipulations the Government of the United States has also been a party.

"A Bill will be introduced at an early date to give effect to the scheme of Federation which has been adopted after the most careful consideration by five of my Australian colonies. I have watched with cordial satisfaction the gradual development of my greater colonies into self-governing communities. I feel confident that the establishment of the great Federation of Australia will prove advantageous, not only to the colonies immediately concerned, but also to the Empire at large.

"The brilliant courage and the soldier-like qualities of the colonial forces engaged in South Africa have already earned high admiration. Patriotic offers of assistance, which it was not possible to accept, have come from many other colonies with populations of various races.

"I have received from the ruling chiefs of Native States in India numerous offers to place their troops and the resources of their States at my disposal for service in South Africa. These proofs of their loyalty to myself and of their devotion to the cause of my Empire have afforded me much gratification.

"I regret that owing to insufficient rainfall in the autumn over a great part of Western and Central India the harvests and pasturage have failed to such an extent as to create a famine. Timely measures have been taken by my Government, and by the rulers of the Native States affected, to relieve suffering and to prevent starvation.

"I regret to add that the epidemic of plague continues, and that although its severity has not increased since last year, there is at present no prospect of its diminution.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"The Estimates for the public service of the year will be laid before you. The provision for military expenditure must be largely increased on account of the charge for military operations in South Africa.

"The experience of a great war must necessarily afford lessons of the greatest importance to the military administrations of the country. You will not, I am convinced, shrink from any outlay that may be required to place our defensive preparations on a level with the responsibilities which the possession of so great an Empire has laid upon us.

"At a time when several other nations are perfecting their naval preparations at the cost of increasing efforts and sacrifices, the solicitude with which you have provided for the efficiency of our Navy and of our coast defences will assuredly not be relaxed.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The time is not propitious for any domestic reforms which involve a large expenditure.

"Proposals, however, will be made to you for several important changes which are not open to this objection. Amendments are required in the laws which govern limited liability companies, and in those which relate to agricultural tenancies. Measures for amending the law of ecclesiastical assessments, and in regard to education in Scotland, and for the relief of tithe-rent payers in Ireland, will also be laid before you. Your attention will also be invited to proposals for better enabling local authorities to aid secondary and technical education in England and Wales; for controlling the contracts of money lenders; for the amendment of the Factory Law, of the Law of Lunacy, and of the Housing of the Working Classes Act.

"The labours of the Commission appointed by me to inquire into the nature and causes of accidents to railway servants are now completed. A Bill, framed with the object of lessening the number of such accidents, will be laid before you.

"It appears that service in South Africa may have the effect of disfranchising those who are taking part in it. You will be asked to sanction a measure by which this injustice will be prevented.

"I commend your deliberations in this anxious time to the blessing and guidance of Almighty God."

Then the Commons withdrew.

House adjourned during pleasure.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR delivered the Report of HER MAJESTY'S GRACIOUS SPEECH from the Throne.

*THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: My Lords, in rising to move that an humble Address be presented by your Lordships in reply to the gracious Speech from the Throne, I would venture to remind your Lordships that there is one custom which always obtains in this House, whether these benches be occupied by those who support the present Government or by the noble Lords who sit on the other side, and it is that you invariably extend a kind indulgence to anyone placed in the position I at present occupy. The first subject in the gracious Speech which you have just heard read, namely, the war in South Africa, is the only one with which I propose to occupy your attention for any time, it being really the one nearest all our hearts. The causes which led to this war are not of any importance to-day. What the nation has to do is to see this matter through. Whether it takes six months, or six years, this country intends to settle the question of her supremacy in South Africa once and for all. The flags of the two Boer Republics must disappear for ever, and the English flag fly from the Zambesi to the Cape of Good Hope; and I trust that, when we have crushed out all resistance, we shall know how to deal with the members of the Government of the two Republics, and those who have aided and abetted them in this gigantic conspiracy to drive us out of South Africa. On the other hand, I hope that the Boer farmers and others, who have been for years purposely misled and deceived as to our aims and intentions by Mr. Kruger and the corrupt oligarchy who misgovern the country and oppress the Uitlanders with the sole object of filling their pockets, and without the slightest regard for the welfare of their countrymen, will be encouraged to return to their usual avocations and participate in the prosperity which is sure to follow the establishment of a just and honest Government. I feel, my Lords, that this war, terrible though it is, will, when brought to a successful termination, be for the real and lasting good of South Africa, and also of this country; and for two reasons. In the first place the Boers, who are, as a people, most ignorant as to the resources of this country, have, ever since the termination of the last war, which ended with Majuba Hill and the disastrous peace which was then made, been quite persuaded that it would be a simple matter to drive the English out of Africa; but by the time the present war is ended they will form a truer estimate of the power of this Empire. In the second place, it will open the eyes of the nation, by bitter experience, to the faults in the existing administration of the War Office, and to the real requirements of our Army. In what I am about to say, your Lordships must not think that I impute blame especially to those at present responsible for the conduct of that office—on the contrary, I think it is our duty as patriots to try and strengthen their hands in the present crisis—but I do think, my Lords, that the system which they found existing there is faulty, and that, when we get breathing time in which to do so, the country will require a complete review of that system. In a few words, my Lords, the Army seems to have existed for the benefit of the War Office. In future, the War Office should exist only for the benefit of our Army. The Army has also suffered from the fact that every Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to consider it the first Department on which to practise economies if he wishes to improve the appearance of his Budget, and this without the slightest regard to the disastrous effects these economies may have on its efficiency. My Lords, we have had reverses and misfortunes; but I think that if our neighbours over the water, who are so ready with hostile criticism, had been obliged to move 100,000 men 6,000 miles by sea before they could put a man or gun in the field, and then found an enemy who, being on the spot, could choose his own fighting ground, and who, we must remember, had for years been preparing for this very war, they would not have done any better than we have done. We have been able to move our troops because—and only because—we have undisputed command of the sea. On this our Empire depends, and I trust this country will take care that she retains that command at whatever cost. Of one thing, my Lords, this country may be justly proud. I refer to the splendid loyalty with which our colonies, with Canada at their head, have come to our assistance. I spent many happy years in Canada—in the woods, on the plains, and in the mountains—and know well the class of men she is sending us. The ranchmen and cowboys from the plains and mountains of the North west are fine riders, good shots, as a rule, and tough, resolute men, used to every hardship and well fitted for such a campaign as the present; and we are also receiving a body of well-drilled Volunteers from the towns and surrounding districts. The other colonies have sent us an equally fine body of men. The rulers of the Native States in India have also offered us men and trained artillery horses, which, I should think, would be invaluable at the present juncture. The successes we have so far achieved in South Africa, my Lords, have been owing to the splendid heroism and devotion of our officers and men, which, under novel and often most trying circumstances, has equalled, if it has not excelled, the best traditions of our Army. They have had to meet, generally on disadvantageous terms, a brave and treacherous enemy, more numerous than our forces as a rule, and to take positions carefully prepared for weeks, and almost impregnable. We have been heavily handicapped in this war by the fact that in face of an enemy consisting wholly of mounted men, and therefore very mobile, we were without any quantity of Cavalry, and had only a small body of Mounted Infantry, the authorities neglecting for a long time to take advantage of the splendid offers of irregular Cavalry from our colonists in Natal—men used to the country, hating the Boers, and perfectly suited for the work. This has, I am glad to say, been rectified, but valuable time has been lost. We have also been terribly under-gunned, and unless the Naval Brigade had, with their usual enterprise and ingenuity, mounted some of the heavy guns from their ships, we should have had absolutely nothing with which to reply to the heavy ordnance of the Boers—in fact, Ladysmith was saved by these naval guns. Of those commanding our troops in South Africa, I would only say that they have had a great responsibility on their shoulders—in the case of Sir Redvers Buller, an almost intolerable one. Adverse criticism of their actions at this distance, and with very little knowledge of their surroundings, political and other, seems to me a great injustice. I am certain that with Lord Roberts and Lord Kitchener at Cape Town, and Sir Redvers Buller in Natal, everything that is possible will be done for the success of our arms. I hope, my Lords, that, besides hurrying out reinforcements to our generals in South Africa, the Government will consider well the desirability of at once mobilising our Navy, of embodying the Militia not yet called out, and all the Volunteers, so that they may receive a training which will enable them, in case of a national emergency, to take the place of the regular troops of whom the country is partially denuded, and then call for all the trained men who have passed through either force, at the same time organising artillery and transport, of which these forces are entirely deficient at present. My Lords, we have won half our splendid Empire with the sword. We have only to look at the nations around us, armed to the teeth and jealous of our prosperity and freedom, to see that we must be prepared to defend the whole of it by the same means. If our sword is a little dull, my Lords, it is our business to put an edge to it, and then, if we keep it loose in the scabbard, with a strong hand on the hilt, we shall not only ensure peace for ourselves, but go far to ensure it for the whole of Europe. My Lords, I doubt if,

since the days of the Indian Mutiny, the Government of this country has had to face such anxieties and difficulties as at the present moment, but I am quite confident that if the country will sink all party differences, and give Her Majesty's Ministers its unanimous support, they will bring the Empire through the present crisis with success and with honour. To turn to other subjects. For the past year we have good cause to rejoice in the prosperity of Egypt, especially in the death-blow dealt to Mahdism by Lord Kitchener and the united English and Egyptian forces at Omdurman, and the taking prisoner of Osman Digna since that time. My Lords, everyone in this country deeply deplores the sufferings of Her Majesty's Indian subjects caused by the plague and one of the most serious famines which have yet occurred in that country. We may, I am sure, depend on the Viceroy and Government of India doing all they can to give relief and assuage suffering, but with an enormous native population, chiefly a very poor one, this is a task of great magnitude, and one which will require all their ability to cope with. I thank your Lordships for the kind manner in which you have listened to me, and I now beg to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty in reply to the Gracious Speech from the Throne."

*THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY :
My Lords, it is my privilege to rise and address your Lordships' House, and to second the noble Duke who has moved that an humble address be presented by your Lordships to Her Majesty in reply to the gracious Speech from the Throne. To me this privilege is rendered of double value inasmuch as it comes at a time when Parliament has been summoned together whilst the nation is in the act of carrying on a war of greater magnitude, perhaps, than any war in which we have been engaged since the days of Wellington, and which has already affected us, and will affect us each one from the highest to the lowest. It is a war that is destined to revolutionise in no small degree all tactics of modern warfare, unless, my Lords, it is to prove an exception to every other war of similar magnitude ensuing on any long periods of peace—those periods of peace during which engines of war, terrible in their death-dealing properties, are of almost daily invention. It is bound to make every nation pause and consider how the lessons to be learnt from it are to be best applied to the perfecting of their national systems for attack and defence, and in like manner it is destined to mark an important epoch in the military history of our Empire. Under these circumstances, therefore, the war must be the all absorbing topic of the hour. It occupies the first position in the gracious Speech from the Throne. Having served until a comparatively recent date in a regiment which is now at the front, under that distinguished, and, I think I may say, very successful leader, General French, you will understand, my Lords, that my interest in this war is of a somewhat special kind. The noble Duke has already enlarged fully upon the magnificent fighting qualities of the British and Colonial soldiers, and on the heroic valour of the officers who lead them, and, indeed, upon every other point of importance in connection with the war. Your Lordships will, I trust, pardon me, however, if I go over the same ground in emphasising the debt of gratitude due by this country to the colonists who have come forward so readily to help her in her hour of need. My Lords, it always seemed to me that Imperial Federation was rather a dream of the future, but what further proof is necessary that it is with us now, if not in substance, at any rate in spirit, when we see sons of Empire going forward shoulder to shoulder to fight for a common cause, and that cause the integrity of the Empire? I would refer, too, to the patriotic spirit shown by the people of this country at this time, whether it be in the ready response of our Reservists, and all those who have volunteered, to the call to arms, or whether it be in the generous financial support given by all classes to any scheme or fund raised for the benefit of those fighting our battles. These few points, my Lords, I think, form a bright side of the picture, if in other ways the situation of affairs in South Africa at this moment gives cause for much anxiety. No country could have done more, no country could wish to do more, to further the efforts of those responsible for the situation to carry what has now become no light an undertaking to a conclusion which shall not only be comprehensive but final. As regards the conduct of the campaign, criticism there has been, perhaps too much. Far be it from me, however, to criticise on such an occasion as this. I would rather content myself with the feeling that during the conduct of this war our generals who are directing the movements of our forces are reaping a golden harvest of experience invaluable to them for further operations in the field at this time, invaluable should they ever again be called upon to take the field, and of greatest value to those who come after them, who may be placed in a similar position. Before leaving the subject of war, I would urge the necessity, which has become so apparent, of establishing national rifle clubs throughout the country. Every man should know how to handle a rifle, every man should know how to shoot. We want no compulsory system of service, but I cannot help thinking that every able-bodied man might give up two years, a year, or six months, to a course of military training either in the Regulars, or in the Militia, or in the Volunteers. On no account do I desire to minimise the gravity of the situation at this moment, but what in a time of real national peril would be the position of an able-bodied man, endowed with all the physical and intellectual qualities necessary, if his services were of no account owing to a want of training during times of peace? It is for us at home to look and see that the magnificent fighting material we possess is backed by a thoroughly sound and strong system of Imperial defence, and if some reorganisation of this system has proved itself necessary at this time I think we may rest assured that it will occupy the attention of Her Majesty's Ministers at an early date. My Lords, the next point in Her Majesty's Speech is the satisfactory adjustment of the Samoan difficulties. The Samoan Islands, I understand, were of no strategic value or importance to Great Britain. The treaty concluded with the German Emperor has apparently settled once and for all a question that gave rise to constant friction between the representatives of three great Powers in those islands, and is, I believe, a treaty thoroughly satisfactory to all parties, and for which Her Majesty's Government has obtained a concession of equal value elsewhere. I should like to dwell for a moment upon the next point in the Speech from the Throne, namely—

"A Bill will be introduced at an early date to give effect to the scheme of Federation which has been adopted, after the most careful consideration, by five of my Australian Colonies."

My Lords, those five colonies, I feel, deserve the fullest measure of cordial congratulation we can give them. For two years and more I had the honour of serving on the staff of Lord Brassey, Her Majesty's representative in the colony of Victoria. It was my privilege to witness the never-to-be-forgotten outburst of loyalty and affection shown by the people of the colony of Victoria, and, indeed, throughout Australia, on the occasion of Her Most Gracious Majesty's Jubilee of 1897. The invitation issued by the Government to the Premiers of all the colonies to visit this country at the time, so readily accepted by them, did more to help on the work of Federation in Australia than we may well be aware of. It brought the representatives of those Colonial Governments into closer touch with the Imperial Government at home. It did more than that. It brought them into a closer touch with each other. When I left Australia at the beginning of 1898, the Convention was then sitting for the purpose of framing a Commonwealth Bill, which was to be acceptable to all. The difficulties at that time seemed to be insuperable, but by a policy of steady perseverance, and a spirit of give and take from all, in five colonies, at any rate, those difficulties have at last been apparently surmounted. We may hope to see ere long another nation growing up of our own kith and kin, strong in the fact of its unity, strong in its loyalty and affection for Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen and her Empire, of which it forms a part, a more than useful ally in times of trouble to the country to whom it owes its birth. My Lords, I think the remaining points in the gracious Speech from the Throne require no further comment from me. This war must occupy, no doubt, the almost undivided attention of your Lordships' House for some little time to come. I am glad to feel that, whatever may be the issue of this struggle—and, backed by the dogged determination of the Government and people of this country, there can be but one issue—we shall emerge from it with the bonds of a united Empire still more closely and firmly knit together, determined to use to the best of our ability our resources and our strength to carry on the work of civilisation, to uphold all that is just and right, and to further the peaceful development of commerce throughout the world. I thank your Lordships for your kind attention to my remarks, and I beg to second the Address.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I feel sure your Lordships will have heard with satisfaction the speeches made by the mover and seconder of the Address. My noble friend the noble Duke made many very sensible observations, with not a few of which I entirely concur. As regards the noble Earl, I am sure the whole House will congratulate him, for I think a more graceful and appropriate speech we have never heard. My Lords, the first subject that is touched on in the Speech from the Throne is our relations with foreign Powers, and I see with pleasure that the noble Marquess has been able to advise Her Majesty to say that our relations with other States are friendly. My Lords, the friendship of other States must always be a matter of the highest consequence to any nation, but at the present moment we must all feel how important it is that we should have friendly relations with the Great Powers of Europe and the United States. I believe I am speaking with accuracy when I say that the relations between the different Governments of Europe and that of the United States and our own Government may be justly described as friendly. I wish we could say as much concerning the general attitude of some of the nations of Europe. I do not wish—Heaven forbid that I should—to add anything to the bitter remarks which have been made as to the feeling shown towards this country in almost all parts of Europe. I cannot pass from that without saying that, without attributing too much to newspaper controversies which go on between the press of the different countries, I do think, without speaking of any particular country, that, with regard to our relations with foreign nations, considerable mischief has been done by the way in which ill-natured remarks in every newspaper, however contemptible, are reported to us. There is a general impression produced, I am convinced, that the situation is much more serious than it is—than the situation really deserves; but what is worse than that is that the continual going on of warfare of that kind serves to irritate people generally and make them feel a want of cordiality towards one another. Not that I deprecate in the least the reporting to us the state of feeling in those countries—I think we are deeply indebted to the press for their reports—but what I do deprecate is the undue amount of stress that is laid on the attacks of the press of other countries, and their being responded to by the press of our own country. It is setting up a kind of paper warfare which I am certain is not conducive to good relations with other countries or to peace. There is only one subject which is specially important in regard to foreign affairs, to which I would refer, and I should be sorry to pass it over. I refer to the negotiations with Germany which have enabled the Government to arrive at a settlement with regard to Samoa. I shall not trouble your Lordships by entering into that matter more fully. For my part, I simply congratulate the noble Marquess on the settlement which has been arrived at of a long-standing difficulty. I will add to that that I think the friendly character of our relations with foreign Powers is due in great measure to the prudence, if I may say so, with which the noble Marquess has conducted the foreign affairs of this country. But I must say this—I have no wish to make an attack upon any member of the Government—that I do hope the noble Marquess will prevent such speeches from being made as were made by the Secretary of State for the Colonies during the recess, and which, though I am certain they were not intended to have such an effect, did, to some extent, neutralise the efforts which the noble Marquess himself had made to bring about a perfectly cordial understanding between us and certain other Powers. I have in years past had some experience of diplomacy, and I am sure that any one who has had anything to do with the conduct of foreign affairs, whether employed in this country or abroad, must know that there is a peculiar discretion necessary in speaking of foreign affairs, and that it is well that those who speak upon them should have some special experience on the subject, and know more precisely than anyone who has not been engaged in such transactions can know what will be the effect of the words they use upon other nations. It is very different to our own domestic affairs. The ground is far more delicate, and it is not perhaps always easy to understand precisely what effect words spoken here by persons of importance may have abroad. I will not pursue the subject, but I felt bound to refer to it, without laying too much stress upon it. Naturally, my Lords, I turn now to that which occupies the thoughts of every one, not only in this House, but throughout the country—I mean the war in South Africa. And in regard to that I wish first of all to express, what is the universal opinion, admiration of the conduct of our troops. Upon that there cannot be two opinions. Whatever may have been the result of their efforts, I am perfectly certain that, in no war in which we have been engaged have our soldiers, and such of our sailors as have been engaged, shown a more determined bravery or a more gallant spirit in the discharge of the dangerous and difficult duties they have been called upon to perform. That has not been confined by any means to the soldiers of this country. It has also been shown in as marked a degree by the bodies of troops, not large, but in themselves important, which the colonies have sent to our assistance. I would also say that I do not believe that too much praise can be awarded to the Natal Volunteers, who have come forward in circumstances of the most painful nature, and have shown that they are worthy in every respect of fighting by the side of the British soldier. The support we are receiving from the colonies is one of those subjects on which we can warmly congratulate ourselves. The support of our colonies has been given with no stinted hand. It has been given cordially; nay, more, it has been given enthusiastically, and, whatever may be the difficulties in which we are involved and the dangers that may beset us in the future, this much at least we know, which we did not know before so fully—that we have with us completely the heart of our colonial people throughout the world. That will, I believe, in the future lead to such a binding together of the whole Empire as will tend to increase our power to a degree which perhaps now we can hardly calculate. Of course, I include all the colonies—Canada, Australia and the rest—but I must refer specially for a moment to the Australian colonies, because a measure of great importance affecting them is mentioned in the Speech from the Throne—namely, the federation of those colonies. I think I may say that, whilst at any time we should have welcomed such a proposal and have viewed it with the most favourable eye, our relations with our colonies are now of such a warm nature that they may be perfectly certain that that measure will be received with cordial approval both in Parliament and in the country. There is one other subject to which I must allude in this connection, and that is the condition of affairs in India. It is a most melancholy thing that India should again this year be afflicted by a terrible famine and also by a continuance of the plague. We deeply sympathise with the people of India, and we must not forget that, even in the stress which is laid upon them, they have not forgotten their relations to this country and have sent us both help and assurances of help in our present anxiety. I mention this because it marks the excellent relations which prevail between ourselves and our people in that part of the world. I have alluded to those various passages in the Speech in which we are all able to concur. I must turn now to the war itself. It is in vain to conceal from ourselves, determined as we are not to shrink from any sacrifice to bring the war to a fortunate conclusion, that we have no reason to congratulate ourselves upon the progress which thus far has been made. This is a moment of the deepest and gravest anxiety. I am not a soldier, but, for other reasons than my want of knowledge of military matters, I shall abstain entirely from criticising the actions of the generals in the field, who have onerous duties to perform in the conduct of these operations. It is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to select the men who are to undertake these difficult operations; it is our duty to support the Government in giving them all the assistance and all the means that they may need; but it seems to me to be unwise to criticise the generals themselves in the carrying out of their operations. But I do not wish by that to imply that I do not feel certain that our generals themselves, as every man who may be employed in the prosecution of the war, are doing their very utmost to perform their arduous duties. Reference is made in the gracious Speech to the experience we have gained with regard to the defects in our military administration.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY): Those are not precisely the words.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I will quote the very words—

That naturally implies what, I think, would under any circumstances be right, that there will probably have to be a revision in many respects of our military administration. I will say more. I think it very possible that it may be found necessary to make careful inquiry into certain particular points. I was going to add that I do not think that this is the occasion or the moment to go into particulars, even if I were capable of going into them, on such a subject. I merely mention it because I think it is a subject which may lead to discussions of great importance in Parliament. I concur with what the noble Duke, I think, said—that the Government will be wise—I am not sure they are not doing it—if they make every effort to be thoroughly prepared for what may occur in the future. We all hope for great success. We may, unfortunately, meet with serious disaster. Nay, more than that. Although our relations with foreign Powers are friendly, it is well to consider what may happen in the future, and it is well the Government should be thoroughly prepared for any event that may occur. I am certain that this country will meet with courage and resolution any eventuality that may arise, but it is not only necessary to be prepared to meet dangers with courage and resolution. You ought to be prepared beforehand with the means which will enable you to surmount those dangers. I agree entirely with the noble Duke opposite, if I rightly understood him, when he said it was highly desirable that the whole of the Militia should be embodied. I confess I have been astonished that the Government have not taken that measure, not merely with reference to the war going on in South Africa, but also for home service, when the country has been denuded of regular troops. If you embody the Militia in time they will become efficient regiments, and it seems to me the whole body should be at the disposal of the Government for home service. That is one point. The other is referred to in this paragraph of the Speech from the Throne—

I gather from that that Her Majesty's Government are well aware of the vital importance of seeing that our one great defence is in the highest condition not only of efficiency, which I hope and believe it is, but also in a state of preparation which may make it easy to utilise it at once whenever it is called upon to discharge any duty which may be laid upon it. I lay stress upon that. I am sure that in the present situation of affairs it is well that our Navy should be quite ready wherever it is called upon to act, and I hope I may say with confidence that the Administration of the present day intend to keep that matter steadily and fully in mind. Circumstances which have come to my knowledge lead me to believe that that is the case, and I shall be glad to have it confirmed from the mouth of those who speak with both knowledge and responsibility. I have said much, I think, on which I may hope for the agreement of all in this House. I must come now to a less pleasant and far less agreeable task, because I do not think I can pass over without criticism certain matters concerning the action of Her Majesty's Government in the past. I entirely deny that it is our duty, when difficulties surround the Government, to abstain entirely from criticism. We are bound not to embarrass the Government, we are bound not to do anything that may diminish their efficiency, but I deny that the efficiency of the Government is seriously impaired by having the mistakes which in our opinion it has made pointed out, even at the present time. At the same time I shall not enlarge at any great length upon them. I may say at once that I have not the slightest intention of going back to the well-worn question of the negotiations with the Transvaal Republic. If mistakes were made then they cannot be mended now by any words we may use. The remarks I shall make relate entirely to our want of preparation for the war in which we find ourselves engaged. That, I think, is a subject of great and pressing importance. I will trouble your Lordships with one or two quotations from speeches made by responsible Ministers of the Crown, because it is from their mouths alone that I gather, to my astonishment, that they seem not to have been aware, or not aware in sufficient time, of the state of preparation of the Transvaal Government and the danger which might consequently arise to the possessions of the Crown in South Africa. The argument which is sometimes used in defence of the Government—I believe the noble Marquess himself in a speech pointed this out—is something like this: If you were largely to increase our troops in South Africa during the time you were conducting negotiations with the Boer Government, it would be so warlike a proceeding that it would not only necessarily prejudice the negotiations, but it would induce the Boers, whose state of preparation was more advanced, to attack you. But that argument does not hold good when the speeches of the responsible Ministers of the Crown themselves are examined. Speaking at Leicester, in November, the Colonial Secretary said—

“The policy of President Kruger led us five times to the brink of war”—that was in past years—and President Kruger only yielded when he looked into the cannon's mouth.”

The right hon. Gentleman then went on to say that all the time President Kruger was piling up tremendous armaments until he found himself in a position in which he thought he could safely defy one of the Great Powers of the world, and that these immense preparations for war began long before the Jameson raid. The comment I would make upon that is this—in the first place, this information must have been long known to the Government, and, in the second place, if this was the view taken by the Colonial Secretary, I am at a loss to understand how the policy which has recently been described as one of bluff could have been adopted and pursued in the face of such knowledge as the Government possessed. The Colonial Secretary told us that President Kruger very wisely, when we put the matter strongly to him and he was not ready for war, did not think it well to rush into the cannon's mouth. Would not the inference be, inasmuch as he was persevering in piling up his armaments, that when he had his preparations complete he would rush into the cannon's mouth? That seems to me a conclusion it is impossible to avoid. It seems to me also unwise to have gone in for a policy of bluff without well considering what would be the result supposing it failed. Of course it was on the cards that it might fail. There was a fair probability of peace in the opinion of many men on both sides; but a fair probability does not exclude the possibility of the other event. With the knowledge that these armaments had been preparing for years and years, since long before the raid, would not anyone have thought that a policy of bluff would be unsafe, because, as the probability of peace might not be followed by peace, you would be landed in war without being prepared for it, as in point of fact you were? I will trouble your Lordships with one more quotation, which is, in my opinion, of still greater importance, and it is a quotation from a speech made by the First Lord of the Treasury at Manchester on the 8th of January last. The whole speech is one of very great interest, but I am only going to quote the passages which appear to be the most vital. Mr. Balfour said—

“Perhaps I shall be asked why did the Government, knowing that armaments were being accumulated in the Transvaal, not enter a protest two years ago, and declare that either the armaments should cease which could by the nature of the case be directed against nothing but this country and her colonies, or else that we should regard it as a cause of quarrel between us and the Boer Government? There was a conclusive reason, and a melancholy reason, why that argument should not have been used to the Boer Government. Our hands were tied and our mouths were closed at that time by the raid. How could we say to the Boer Government, ‘You must disarm, you have nothing to fear from us; your armaments, if you accumulate them, must be directed, not to self-defence, but to aggression?’—how, I say, could we use that language when three years ago an expedition composed of our countrymen had from British territory made an onslaught—a feeble and ineffective onslaught, it is true, but still an onslaught—on the Boer Government? We were helpless in face of that argument. That argument could never be used in the face of public opinion and in the face of Europe, for it was always open to the Boer Government to say that these arms that were accumulating, these munitions of war which were choking their arsenals, were intended, not for aggression, but simply as a measure of precaution and of self-defence against a second raid taking place from our territory. Now you will see the point that I am leading up to. The argument I wish to meet is this, that we entered into this war insufficiently prepared on the spot to deal with the military situation we had to face: and I am of opinion, looking back with all the impartiality I can, that the steps we took were, in the state of our knowledge, sufficient steps, and that the policy we pursued is the policy which all impartial judges of the situation will agree to be one which ought to have commended itself to the responsible Government of the country."

Now, my Lords, I cannot see that there is in that argument any sufficient excuse for the course pursued by the Government. These armaments had commenced, Mr. Chamberlain tells us, long before the Jameson raid. It was perfectly well known—it must have been known; it was impossible for it not to have been known—that these armaments were accumulating to a point which could not possibly be required for the purpose of dealing either with such a raid as the Jameson raid or with the Uitlander population in the Transvaal. What, in my opinion, the Government ought to have done was this. When they knew that these armaments were growing beyond anything which could possibly be necessary to repel a raid, or to restrain the Uitlanders, the obvious course would have been to have communicated with the Boer Government. But let me say that, in the first place, the Government ought to have punished much more severely the authors of the Raid. I know it may be said that perhaps we on this side share some of the blame; but I think we committed a grievous mistake in not inflicting severer punishment on the authors, great and small, of the raid. Nothing but that would have convinced the Boers of our good intentions. And, having done that, the Government should have said to the Boers: "We willingly and fully recognise your perfect right and the necessity you are under to arm to the point needed for preventing any such raid as the Jameson raid and of keeping order in your own country. But we know that you are accumulating armaments day by day and they are growing to a point far beyond what you can require for those purposes; and it is our duty to point out that unless you desist your action must lead to our sending large forces to South Africa, when there will be a probability of our coming into collision. We do not wish to adopt an unfriendly attitude towards you, but if you persevere in this course we will have no alternative." My opinion is that if the Boers had persevered after that warning in accumulating armaments visibly directed against ourselves it would have been a just and necessary cause for war then and there. The whole matter was, however, allowed to drift until the Government found themselves in such a situation that they were not prepared, in case of the failure of their negotiations, to take the necessary measures to enforce their view. That is the conclusion I draw from that portion of Mr. Balfour's speech. I will ask you to refer in your minds to things which have occurred not very long ago, and affecting Great Powers. Would you have ventured, in your negotiations, to take up the attitude you took up—and took up successfully—if you had not known that you were prepared, if diplomacy failed, to back it up? But there is something much more wonderful than that, because Mr. Balfour actually told us the Government knew no more than the man in the street. Now I should be the last in the world to question the veracity of anything the First Lord of the Treasury said; yet I am free to confess that I cannot believe the possibility that the Government knew no more than the man in the street. I cannot see how that could be. There is no precedent for it that I ever heard of. I am a man in the street, knowing in a general way more than the ordinary man in the street, but I never suppose for a moment that I possess information on any particular subject which the Government have to deal with, beyond perhaps domestic matters, at all equal to the information they possess. It is absolutely impossible to conceive that the Government should not have been fully and entirely informed of what was going on in the Transvaal. We had an agent there, and the country was open to any one to go to. Why, it would have only required a very moderate amount of activity to find out—I will not say every detail, but generally what was going on. Cannon and large quantities of ammunition are not brought into a country without its being generally known. I have heard, indeed, that some of the cannon were made in this country; and cannon and ammunition are not conveyed by railway in such a manner that nobody hears of it. Therefore, I cannot believe that the Government knew no more than the man in the street. They must have known generally what was going on in the Transvaal. I have seen them accused of ignorance, but I do not believe that is possible. They appear also to have thought, if I take seriously what Mr. Balfour says, that their policy ought to be guided entirely by the man in the street, because he says—

“Supposing we had come to Parliament in the middle of August and said ‘We want you to vote us immense supplementary estimates for the provision of immediate transport to South Africa’ . . . what would have been said by the great mass of moderate opinion, both on the other side and on our own side of the House, if we had made such a proposition as that?”

That seems to me entirely apart from the real question. The question which every Government has to consider when grave affairs are at stake is not what their supporters, not what the man in the street, not what the Opposition may say, but what in their mature judgment the safety and interest of the country require. The responsibility is laid on them, having made up their minds, to make a proposal to Parliament and the country. Whether they accept it or not, the Government cannot justify themselves in remaining responsible for affairs of a grave and serious kind if they have made up their minds that a certain course is necessary unless the nation is prepared to back them. It is their duty to announce their policy and press it, and stand or fall by it; and more than that, in my humble judgment that is a course which would ensure the safety generally of the Government, because the nation would know that, if the men to whom it has confided the government of the country come forward and make such a statement as that, there are most grave reasons behind it. Is it to be said that the country has come to that pass, that the Government may not safely appeal to the country to give it the necessary support? That is not the view that is taken here. Mr. Balfour went on to say something even more grave. He said—

“Our institutions are such that such a determined policy becomes impossible.”

The Earl of Kimberley.

After describing at length what might have happened, he said:

“If this is true, would not such a policy be insane?”

In my opinion, there is nothing more insane than not proposing a policy which you believe to be a true one. Mr. Balfour went on to say—

“Our institutions, our free institutions, have their merits and have their demerits, and their demerits are intimately and inseparably bound up with their merits. Their merit is this—that no Government can act in great affairs unless it has the opinion of the community behind it. But the defect of that system is that, when the opinion of the community lags behind the necessities of the case, there may be occasions when sufficient rapidity of action is denied to the executive Government.”

Stronger statements than that have been made in irresponsible quarters, where there seems to be a conclusion arrived at that the institutions of the country are such that we cannot, as in the past, carry on a war. I deny it. I say our institutions are such that the Government has the power, if it has the courage, to beg the support of the people. They may ask for supplies, they may call upon the country for support, they may take any steps they think right, and unless the people are persuaded that the Government ought to be changed the institutions are such that the Government will receive the confidence of the nation. I must say that under all the circumstances of the case—with the majority in Parliament which the Government has, and with an Opposition which is not powerful, though I am bound to defend it—I think the Government had nothing to fear, and that the institutions of the country, if worked in the ordinary manner, are abundant to enable them to take any course which they think best. I deprecate in the strongest manner that it should be held out that, if the Government of this country has determined that the welfare of the country requires something to be done, there is anything to hinder them from obtaining all the support necessary except the withdrawal of the confidence of the country. Who can doubt the truth of what I say if he looks round and sees the universal enthusiasm, the way in which men who altogether disapprove of the war are ready—every man practically—to give support to the Government of the day? I am sorry to trouble you with long extracts and sorry to attack the man who made these observations—a man for whom I have the highest respect, but I could not pass over what I believe to be a destructive and dangerous doctrine. There is one point I should like to add, though it is going back a little on what I have said already. It was said that you could not avoid the war after negotiations had been pushed to a certain point, and then you say, on the other hand, that you were not prepared. Why was it, if you were not prepared, that you were about to deliver an ultimatum yourselves?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: How do you know that?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: No doubt the Transvaal ultimatum made war absolutely unavoidable; but let us see the position in which you were about to place yourselves. You must have known that if your ultimatum were rejected—

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I do not admit that at all.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Of course, if an ultimatum was not going to be presented my argument, to a certain extent, falls to the ground, but I am sure of this, that more extensive demands were intended to be made. It seems to me that in the circumstances in which you were placed it was the height of imprudence to push the matter still further, knowing that in all probability the result might be that the Boers would anticipate you, and your colony would be overrun. I have spoken of the want of knowledge on certain matters, but I cannot help mentioning a speech made by a gentleman, a very able gentleman, not in the Cabinet and not now connected with the War Office—Mr. Brodrick. He said that at all events the heart was right if the head was wrong. I have no doubt the heart of the Cabinet is in the right place, but if the head is in the wrong place it concedes much for which we have been arguing. Mr. Brodrick also said that the Government had been deceived. By whom were they deceived? Did their Intelligence Department deceive them? Did Mr. Conyngham Green deceive them? How was it they came to be misled? I am well aware there is something much more important than this, and that is the conduct of the war. Whilst I have felt it my duty to make these criticisms, believing as I do that there are strong grounds for finding fault with the Government on certain matters—for want of knowledge apparently and want of foresight—I can assure them that, far from wishing to take the smallest party advantage, if I were capable of it, I desire now nothing so much as to support the Government to the utmost in carrying on this war, and I desire that their efforts should be crowned with the fullest success.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I must commence by doing what the noble Earl did, and that is by thanking my two noble friends behind me for the speeches with which they opened the debate. They expressed, in eloquent language, sentiments which I am convinced echo the feelings of the country, and much that they have said will be read both with pleasure and with advantage not only in this country, but in distant parts of the world. I have next to say that the noble Earl impressed me with a feeling which he occasionally does impress me with—a despair of knowing what on earth I have got to say, because he began his speech, as he always does begin his speeches, with a series of unimpeachable propositions, to which I can only reply “Amen.” In the early part of his speech, expressed with great force and vigour, he said many things for which I heartily thank him. I will not go further into that, because it is an unfortunate fact of human nature that controversy is always much less dull than agreement in sentiment. But I will deal with the latter part of his speech, in which he went upon the question how far we were to blame for the condition in which the ultimatum of the South African Republic found us. I do not think the noble Earl went back quite far enough. I think he must accompany me back to the lengthy negotiations of 1881 and 1884, and he must note that in the stipulations of the Conventions of those years there was not one word to limit, to suspect, or to hinder the unrestricted importation of any amount of munitions of war that the South African Republic might desire. The port of Lorenzo Marques, in the hands of a foreign Power, was open to them, the railway came immediately upon their country, and there was nothing in the treaty to prevent them using that inlet for the utmost armaments they might think it desirable to possess. It is perfactly true that they were not permitted by the treaty of 1881 to make agreements with foreign Powers without our consent, and therefore, if matters had stood in that position they would not have been in a condition to make the agreement which they did make with Portugal—that all munitions of war should freely enter into the country. But this difficulty has struck me. I looked to the records and found, to my extreme surprise, that permission to make this pernicious engagement which has been the cause of all our sorrows was conceded without a word by a Government of which the noble Earl was a member. That course was a very serious handicap. The noble Lord tells us that we ought to have known what arms and munitions were being introduced. I cannot follow him throughout all his debate, for he adopted a practice which is a little inconvenient—namely, that of attacking in this House not the Members of it who are present, but Members of the other House. The noble Earl quoted extracts from speeches by Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Balfour, and Mr. Brodrick, and he has thought it his business to attack those speeches. If I had known beforehand that the noble Earl was going to do this I would have had those speeches bound and placed on the table before me, but it is impossible for me to charge my memory with what those gentlemen exactly said, and I will not undertake to defend them. I have no doubt they are perfectly competent to defend themselves. But when the noble Earl says that we must have known, that it was impossible we should not have known—he got into a fervour of enthusiasm over the certainty of the knowledge that we must have possessed—about the artillery and munitions of war that the Republics were introducing—I ask, How on earth were we to know it? I believe, as a matter of fact—though I do not give this as official—that the guns were generally introduced in boilers and locomotives, and the munitions of war were introduced in pianos. It was not our territory, we had no power of search, we had no power of knowing what munitions of war were sent in, and we certainly had no power of supervising their importation into the Republics.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Do you know nothing of the armaments of other nations?

The Marquess of Salisbury.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Not so much as we ought to. It is a very remarkable peculiarity of public opinion in this country that people always desire to eat their cake and have it. They rejoice very much in the spiritual complacency which is afforded them by the reflection that they have a very small Secret Service Fund. Information, however, is a mere matter of money and nothing else. If you want much information, you must give much money; if you give little money, you will have little information. And, considering the enormous sums which are spent by other Powers, not least by the Transvaal Republic, which I was told on high diplomatic authority has spent £800,000 in one year in secret service, and comparing these with the ridiculously small sums that have for a great number of years been habitually spent by English Governments, it is impossible to have the omniscience which the noble Earl seems to regard as the necessary attribute of Her Majesty's Government. He has quoted the speeches of Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Balfour to show that we now know that the Boer Republics were accumulating during a long series of years the tremendous armaments from which we are suffering now. We know it now; we have the best reason in the world for knowing it. But that we knew it to the extent to which it existed in June last I, at all events speaking for myself, most entirely deny. The important thing is not whether we knew it or not, but whether we knew it in a form of evidence upon which we could go to Parliament. I daresay many of us, considering the nature of the Boers and the past history and character of Mr. Kruger, may have thought it was very likely that they were making enormous preparations, and that war at no distant period was possible. But what we had to do was to take to the House of Commons some proof that our surmises were real. It was no use our saying we suspect this or we suspect that; the House of Commons would not have voted two or three millions of extra expenditure a year for the defence of the frontier of Natal if we could have shown them nothing more real than empty surmises. In my judgment the original fault lay in the treaties of 1881 and 1884, by which this bitterly hostile population was installed in the midst of you, with every facility for the introduction of all the arms they pleased. This was done without any precautions to prevent it or to supervise it, and it created a situation of great and continuing danger. No doubt President Kruger, who is a shrewd man, succeeded in accumulating great armaments without, until very recently, any suspicion of their enormous size having reached those who were concerned. But the noble Lord seems to think that that is an elementary matter which we were bound to know. You cannot see through a deal board. We had no means of knowing the extent of the preparations, although everybody knew they existed to a certain extent. Then the noble Lord will say—You are arguing, therefore, that the reverses and difficulties under which we are at present suffering were inevitable. I am not at all prepared to say they were inevitable. That is a matter on which we shall decide later, when we have had an opportunity of hearing all the circumstances of the case. I am not at all prepared to say that it was not within the region of possibility and human strategy to have deferred the more acute phases of the conflict until the necessary reinforcements had been sent out. I do not say it was so, and I do not say it was not so. I will not give any opinion on the subject until we have been enabled to make inquiry. But I heartily concur in the view of the noble Lord that it is not for us now to express any criticism on the military operations, because we cannot hear the opinion of those who are justly entitled to be heard on the point. I entirely deny that the authors of the most lamentable treaties of 1881 and 1884 have a right to reproach us because President Kruger was enabled to introduce an enormous amount of armament without our knowledge—or without our knowledge until the matter had assumed a very serious character. My Lords, I confess this seems to me to be to a certain extent an unprofitable discussion, because it is almost impossible to take any step in the argument without seeming to call in question the actions of some man or set of men who ought not to be judged until they have been heard, and until a full examination has been made into their case. Therefore, I have very unwillingly entered into this point. I only wish to repeat that I cast the responsibility for the introduction of these vast armaments on the persons who signed the treaties of 1881 and 1884. For the rest, my Lords, I am glad that the noble Earl did not propose, as I understood it was likely he would, an immediate inquiry into the action of either the military authorities at home or the generals in the field. Such an inquiry would be in no sense complete. We do not deprecate it, we do not shrink from it, but we should gravely disapprove of an inquiry held before those who could give us most valuable information were in a position to appear before us. Therefore, I think that, though an inquiry would be quite wise, it would be better deferred to a more propitious period. I cannot entirely coincide with the constitutional fervour which the noble Earl displayed in the latter part of his speech. I do not believe in the perfection of the British Constitution as an instrument of war. As an instrument of peace it has not yet met its match, but for purposes of war there is more to be said. If you look back over the present century you will see there have been four occasions on which the British Government has engaged in war. On each occasion the opening of these wars was not prosperous, and on each occasion the Government of the day and the officers in command were assailed with the utmost virulence of popular abuse. These were the Walcheren expedition, the Peninsular War, the Crimean War, and now the South African War. In all those cases at first—in the case of Walcheren not only at first—there were lamentable losses. In all those cases there was the fiercest denunciation of the Government of the day and of the generals who had charge of the operations. Did I hear the noble Earl deny that?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: No, I said there was a great deal of truth in it.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I do not know whether the noble Earl has read the life of the Duke of Wellington, recently published, written by Sir Herbert Maxwell—a most admirable book.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Yes.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Then the noble Earl will have noticed that even so dignified, sedate, sober, and far-seeing a body as the Common Council of the City of London denounced the rashness and inexperience of the Duke of Wellington, and exhorted the Government to recall him. In the case of Walcheren the miscarriage was too great to allow for any mistake that was made, and nobody interfered on behalf of Lord Chatham and Sir Richard Strachan. In the Crimean war, as the noble earl will himself remember, a fierce attack was made on the unfortunate Duke of Newcastle, who was a very able and conscientious man, and not in the least degree guilty of the things laid to his charge, but the fury of popular indignation was so great that he made way before it. I think he made a great mistake in doing so, because before a couple of years had passed away a complete reaction set in. But the moral I wish to draw from this uniformity of experience is that it is not the extraordinary folly or feebleness of particular Ministers or generals with which you have to deal, which is the sole cause of your reverses. There must be something else. We cannot have been so unlucky as to have fought four times and to have lighted upon the most incompetent and worthless Ministers that the world has ever produced. It is evident there is something in your machinery that is wrong, and that leads me to accept with a very doubting mind the glowing eulogism which the noble Earl passed upon the fighting qualities of the British Constitution. I am inclined to doubt these qualities, and I will recommend to the meditation of the noble Lord these considerations. The art of war has been studied on the continent of Europe with a thoroughness and self-devotion that no other science has commanded, and at the end we find ourselves surrounded by five great military Powers, and yet on matters of vital importance we pursue a policy wholly different from those military Powers. Do not understand for a moment that I am guilty of such profanity as to blame the British Constitution. I am not. I am pointing out that in this matter we enjoy splendid isolation. Of course, first and foremost stands conscription, and no one imagines, even among the youngest of us, that he will ever live to see conscription adopted in this country. Then comes the employment as experts of persons sitting in Parliament exercising power over the military administration, who are named by the Government, but who have not to obtain the approval of the electors and the constituencies. It is an important and very difficult question. Then there is the big question of promotion by seniority, a delicate subject; but I doubt if you will find that promotion by seniority prevails in any of the great armies of Europe to the extent it prevails here. Then there is that matter of secret service to which I have already referred. There is no other country which is content to protect itself with so slight a supply of funds as our own; and last of all I feel I am laying my hand on the sacred feature of the Constitution when I say there is the Treasury. At the present time I feel assured that the powers of the Treasury have been administered with the greatest judgment, and the greatest consideration, and do not imagine for a moment that I support the idiotic attacks which have been made on the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. He is a Minister who has filled the office with the greatest consideration to the powers of the Treasury; but I say that the exercise of its powers in governing every department of the Government is not for the public benefit. The Treasury has obtained a position in regard to the rest of the departments of the Government that the House of Commons obtained in the time of the Stuart dynasty. It has the power of the purse, and by exercising the power of the purse it claims a voice in all decisions of administrative authority and policy. I think that much delay and many doubtful resolutions have been the result of the peculiar position which, through many generations, the Treasury has occupied. Do not imagine for a moment that I say it is in any way due to those with whom I have had the honour of sitting in the Cabinet. Now I notice these things because I was stimulated to it by the enthusiasm—what I call the 1688 enthusiasm—which has animated the mind of the noble Lord. I do not think that the British Constitution as at present worked is a good fighting machine. I have stated that it is unequalled for producing happiness, prosperity, and liberty in time of peace; but now, in time of war, when great Powers with enormous forces are looking at us with no gentle or kindly eye on every side, it becomes us to think whether we must not in some degree modify our arrangements in order to enable ourselves to meet the dangers that at any moment may arise. I have only been induced to make these remarks by what has fallen from the noble Earl, but I confess—and it is a humiliating confession—that both he and I have been wasting a good deal of time of the House this evening. I do not think that this looking back on past history, this examination of the particular blame that may attach to this or that Minister, or the particular force that we may lend to the speech of any Minister—I do not think that these quite come up to the dignity of the present crisis. We have something more to do than to examine into the past action of Ministers or the present reputation they bear. If you are able to come forward and say, “We have a better set of Ministers to propose to the Crown,” and if you can persuade the House of Commons to that opinion, of course, you are doing your duty; but if you are not able to do this, I do not think there is much use in discussing it in such a crisis as this. We must all join together to exercise all the powers we can give in order to extricate ourselves from a situation that is full of humiliation, and not free from danger. I do not say that the danger may not be easily exaggerated. Many a country has begun a great war with difficulties of the kind. We have only to look at what the Northern States of America went through at the beginning of the Civil War, to see how easy it would be to draw a mistaken inference from the reverses with which we have been met at the opening of this war. We have every ground to think that if we set ourselves heartily to work, and exert all the undoubted instruments of power we possess, we shall bring this war to a satisfactory conclusion. I think we must defer the pleasing task of quarrelling among ourselves until that result has been obtained. We have a work that now appeals to us as subjects of the Queen—as Englishmen; and it must throw into shadow the ancient claim, the well-known and acknowledged claim, which party expediency has upon the action of all our statesmen. The noble lord has spoken of what men have said in the other House. I confess I saw with some regret that a noble lord of great position is about to bring this great issue into a party conflict. It is much to be regretted. The only place where he will create sympathy, where he will arouse enthusiasm, is at Pretoria. Our object must be to retrieve ourselves as rapidly as possible from the situation into which we have got. We are in this position. It is worse than many we have gone through before, for we are repelling men who have invaded our territory, and the reverses we have suffered are in consequence of our inability to drive them back. That is a position which cannot last. Remember that this Empire which we sustain is a valuable, splendid, but also a very responsible possession to support. If anything happens to tear asunder the great continental countries, by the mere force of their geographical juxtaposition, they must come together again, and the evil will be repaired. There is not in our Empire any coercing or retaining force which will answer the same end; and unless we can sink all lesser issues, unless we take all smaller passions into the one great duty of sustaining our country in this crisis, we shall run the danger of convulsions which will certainly tarnish its lustre, and perhaps menace its integrity.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: My Lords, I can say, with the utmost truth, what many say by way of rhetorical figure, that when I entered this House I had no more idea of addressing your Lordships than the clock I see in the gallery. But I confess that the speech which we have just heard moves me against myself to make one or two remarks which are pertinent to the extreme gravity of the situation in which we stand. May I, in the first place, say what has not been said before—how truly and deeply I am sure I voice the sympathy of this House for once with the noble Marquess in the terrible bereavement which has robbed him since we last met of the noble and gifted lady who shared the triumphs of his career. But when I pass from that reflection to the speech we have just heard, I ask myself, Why is it that the Prime Minister of this country makes it so hard for “the man in the street”—to which august category I belong with others—to support his Government? He said just now that the speech of the noble Earl behind me was unworthy of the dignity of the occasion.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am afraid that the noble Lord has misunderstood me if he understood me to say that the manner of the noble Earl was in any way unworthy. I meant to say that both of us in examining the past conduct of the Government had been dealing with a matter which was not the most pressing at the present moment.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: The past conduct of the Government is a matter which some day will come up for investigation and for inquisition, and they will have to meet an indictment not without force or without gravity. But I hope in my heart and conscience that the investigation may not take place till such a time as the Government and all those who are serving the Queen at this moment may be covered with such a blaze of triumph and of glory that the eye of investigation may be somewhat dazzled and dimmed. When I think of where we stand I am appalled by the nature and the style, the manner and the matter, of the speech of the Prime Minister of Great Britain addressing this ancient and hereditary House. How do we stand at this moment? We have 120,000 men in South Africa, and we at this moment have not been able to advance into the enemy's territory at all. Indeed, we have difficulty in holding our own. The attitude of foreign nations is described by the usual language of courtesy as friendly, but that language is considerably mitigated by the observation of the noble Marquess himself. It does not strike me as being as amicable as the word used would imply, and as it is stated to be in the Speech from the Throne. Here I must differ for one moment from the noble Earl behind me. He thinks it a mistake that our newspapers should reproduce so accurately the language of the foreign press when it is hostile to ourselves. He said—I think he made a slip there—that we reproduce all the hostile language of the foreign press which is addressed to ourselves. Our press can undertake no such gigantic task as that of reproducing all the hostile language of the foreign press. It is not a fiftieth or a hundredth part of that hostile language which we are privileged to read in our own papers. But I welcome the enterprise of our journalists in reproducing some of it, because otherwise we should be living in a fool's paradise—an insular paradise—believing that the nations who have long been envious of our prosperity and have recently been alienated by the language of our diplomacy are by no means unfriendly to us. We stand in a parlous position. We have had explanations as to what is the present position in the view of the Government; and I confess I think that my noble friend was fully justified in touching on those explanations, which are the only authoritative ones that we have had. The noble Marquess brushed them contemptuously aside. He said, as he has often said on similar occasions, that it is not fair in this House to criticise speeches delivered by those who do not belong to this House. That is a hard saying; and he did not soften it, I may mention, by adding, as his own view of the British Constitution—on which he dilated at great length and with startling novelty and originality—that it was wrong to criticise a Government if you were not able to turn it out. That is a contention which would reduce the sacred but limited band behind me to silence and exile for the rest of their lives. But if my noble friend was not to criticise the speeches of Mr. Balfour and Mr. Chamberlain, or of any one who is not privileged by creation or succession to a seat in this House, whom was he to criticise? I scan the opposite bench, and I cannot see any one, except my noble friend who is President of the Council and who is also the President of the Defence Committee, which has been such a bulwark for our country—excepting the noble Duke, who made a speech at the Imperial Institute on education, a speech which would not therefore have been pertinent to any part of the argument of my noble friend, I cannot see any Minister who has broken silence since the month of November. We stand, therefore, in a strange position. The noble Marquess brushes aside all criticism of the only Ministerial utterances which we have had to clear up the position. He says that if he had had the slightest idea that those speeches would have been called in question in this House he would have had them bound and placed on the Table before him for comment. Did ever any one hear such a defence of two of the most important members of the Cabinet delivered by the Prime Minister at such a crisis of his country's history? There is, at any rate, one question which we are anxious to have answer to. That question was pressed home and was not met. We have a right to know, and though we cannot enforce it by any vote—if the men in the street of whom we hear so much had seats in this House it would be carried by an overwhelming majority—we have a right to know from the noble Marquess, or whoever may succeed him in the debate, whether there was adequate information given to the Government before the crisis in the Transvaal appeared; or whether even there was sufficient information to guide them in their diplomacy and negotiations. That is the point which the nation will insist upon knowing, whether in this House or the other. If you had not sufficient information, dismiss your Intelligence Department, dismiss Mr. Conyngham Greene and your Consular Agents wherever they exist and had touch with this matter, at Lorenzo Marques and elsewhere. If you did know of it you have a heavy responsibility to bear. The noble Marquess says, "How can we see through a deal board?" I suppose he meant by that to allude to pianoforte cases in which, with more knowledge than he gave himself credit for, he unofficially states that the ammunition was taken into Pretoria.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am only told so.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: The noble Marquess only states it unofficially. He says that he cannot see through a deal plank, and that therefore he has no means of knowing what was smuggled into Pretoria. I should be glad of any official statement to balance the unofficial statement of the noble Marquess. Then he proceeded with a statement which struck me as more startling still. He said, "Give us more secret service money and we will receive and, in our turn, give you more information." My Lords, the Government is in possession of a very commanding majority in this House—I reckon it at 95 per cent.—it may be more or it may be less. They have in the House of Commons a majority which it is impossible to compute, but which I should say would roughly be represented by three-quarters of the House, or, if that is an exaggerated estimate, by two-thirds of the House. If they have the responsibility of Government they are bound to ask for such funds, whether for secret service or any other, as they may think necessary for the safety of the Empire. They cannot devolve that responsibility upon your Lordships by speaking of the working of the British Constitution. I ask you to analyse the speech of the noble Marquess which is still ringing in your ears. It is the speech of a Minister explaining a disastrous position to Parliament; and he practically has only given two explanations of that situation. They are, first, that the Government have not enough secret service money to obtain information; and, secondly, the mysterious working of the British Constitution. I suppose there are foreign representatives in the gallery listening to this debate; and I suppose that the speech of the Prime Minister will be flashed all over Europe to-night to tell Europe what the Prime Minister has to say in this crisis. And Europe, which is watching with a keen and not a benevolent interest the proceedings of our armies in South Africa, will learn that the causes of our disasters are—one avoidable, and the other inevitable. The avoidable cause is the inadequate amount of the secret service vote, and the inevitable one is the secular working of the British Constitution. I pass from that question to ask another which is of much more interest for me. We do not care to know at this moment how it is that the war began and found us unprepared and has left us in a position almost of humiliation ever since. But what we have a right to know now is—What do the Government intend to do? There is a paragraph in the Queen's Speech, a paragraph which I rejoice to see, of a somewhat didactic character in its first sentence, but not without interest in its second—

"The experience of a great war must necessarily afford lessons of the greatest importance to the military administrations of the country. You will not, I am convinced, shrink from any outlay that may be required to place our defensive preparations on a level with the responsibilities which the possession of so great an Empire has laid upon us."

The noble Marquess made no reference to that paragraph, except to say that he does not think we shall see compulsory service in the life of the youngest Peer present. I do not affirm or question that proposition. But I do not see that it is as immeasurably remote as the noble Marquess considers that some form of compulsory service should have to be introduced to meet the growing exigencies of the Empire; and I am quite sure that neither from that nor from any other sacrifice will the nation recoil to preserve the predominance of this Empire. We have sent from our island a vast mass of the troops which usually garrison it. Situated as we are, as has been more than once said, in the centre of a universe which is by no means friendly to us, that we should not have a hint from the First Minister of the Crown as to what military measures they propose to take in the face of the disasters with which we have met, and as to the sacrifices which we must inevitably be called upon to make to redress them—that is one of the most extraordinary features of the working of the British Constitution on which the noble Marquess has laid such stress. I agree with him in saying that the country will carry this thing through. It will carry it through, in spite of all the impediments, both of men and of methods, which have shackled it in the past. But I venture to say that it will have to be inspired by a loftier tone and by a truer patriotism than we have heard from the Prime Minister to-night.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (the Marquess of LANSDOWNE): My Lords, the noble Earl has asked Her Majesty's Government a question which, no doubt, he had an excellent right to ask. He asked us what were our intentions as to the military measures which the critical circumstances of the present moment seemed to him to require. If I do not give the noble Earl a detailed answer to that question it is not because I dispute his right to ask it, but because I confess that the Debate on the Address scarcely seems to us the proper opportunity for unfolding to Parliament a full statement upon a very technical matter. The noble Earl will believe me when I say that I give this answer not with any idea of putting him off, but merely because I do not regard the present as the proper moment for answering the question. I can state to him to-night that I shall be ready on a very early date to explain fully to your Lordships what military measures Her Majesty's Government have in contemplation. Both the noble Earls who have spoken opposite have reproached Her Majesty's Government, first, with their ignorance as to the Boer preparations, and, next, with their unpreparedness for war when it broke out. The noble Earl the leader of the Opposition in this House quoted from a speech of Mr. Balfour's a passage in which Mr. Balfour seemed to admit that we were open to the reproach of unpreparedness for war. But I think the statement of Mr. Balfour was that we were unprepared for war on the spot, and that is, after all, a very different thing. That we were not altogether unprepared for war is surely obvious when we consider the statement of the noble Earl below the gangway (the Earl of Rosebery) that we have been able within a few weeks to send 120,000 troops 6,000 miles across the sea, and land them in a full state of efficiency and equipment. That, surely was no proof of unpreparedness at home. Then the noble Earl complained that we were without information as to the military preparations of the South African Republic. I think that he has done us an injustice. There are, no doubt, many cases in which munitions of war have passed through Lorenzo Marques under the various disguises indicated by the Prime Minister, but I am able to tell the House that the Intelligence branch has been able from time to time to supply us with information which I believe to be extremely correct as to the extent and the nature of the Boer preparations. The estimate made by the Intelligence branch of the number of armed men to be found in the two South African Republics is, I believe, a correct estimate, and one which our experience of these military operations has not in any way falsified. I think it extremely likely that the Intelligence branch may have wrongly conjectured the exact number of men whom we were likely to find at any particular point opposing us in the field. It is clearly a matter for conjecture whether the two Republics were likely or not to detach a part, and if so what part of their fighting force, either for the purpose of garrisoning their cities or for the purpose of watching the native tribes at different portions of their borders. It is also fair to the Intelligence Department to add that they had no means of forming a very precise estimate of the additions which the Boer forces have received from various sources—to some extent, I am afraid, from amongst the disloyal Dutch of our own colonies, and also to some extent by the gradual accretion of small bodies of mercenaries of different nations, who, like the munitions of war, found their way more or less surreptitiously through Portuguese territory into the Transvaal; but with these two reservations, I am able to say that in my belief the estimate given to us by the Intelligence branch was, on the whole, a trustworthy estimate. When I come to the question of guns, I believe in the same way that they were able before the war began, or became inevitable, to tell us, at any rate with approximate accuracy, what was the nature of the armaments in the hands of the two Republics. What I think we did possibly underrate—and I do not care how frankly I confess it—was not the numbers or the armaments of the Boers, but their value as fighting men. They have shown an amount of resource, an amount of mobility and of tenacity for which I think most of us were not prepared; and I think it is in that sense that my noble and gallant colleague, the Commander-in-Chief, in a speech he delivered in the autumn, very frankly admitted that the Boers had shown themselves more powerful and more numerous than we had been led to expect. With regard to our unpreparedness for war, the noble Earl told us that if we were not sufficiently informed as to the preparations of the Boers we undertook a great responsibility in making war upon them. My Lords, I believe that every member of Her Majesty's Government in the summer of last year realised perfectly well that war in the end might prove inevitable; but we did not believe that it was inevitable, and so long as by any action consistent with our self-respect we could avoid that war we were anxious to avoid it, knowing as we did that it would prove a very serious and a very costly war—costly not only in treasure, but costly, I mean, in the loss of precious lives which cannot be replaced. We were determined, my Lords, that we would take no steps which might have the effect of precipitating a collision with the South African Republic. We believed that it was perfectly possible to draw an intelligible line between those military measures which were necessary for the purpose of securing our colonies in South Africa and those other measures which might be necessary should an invasion of the two Republics be determined upon. My Lords, while negotiations were still in progress we determined to restrict ourselves to those purely protective measures which seemed to us sufficient for the purpose and which, in our belief, were not calculated to provoke a rupture of the negotiations which were proceeding. I believe that at that time the country was with us in this policy. Throughout the summer of last year the negotiations were proceeding, and proceeding, on the whole, hopefully. We received from the South African Republic one proposal after another, each of them apparently more hopeful and more encouraging as to a satisfactory issue, and I think we are not to blame if, while those negotiations were going on, we shrank from such measures as, for example, the calling out of the Reserves or the sending of a large expeditionary force which could only be intended for aggressive purposes. It may be argued that that policy was too hazardous for us; but I think we are not open to that charge unless it can be shown that there was reason for believing that the precautions which were taken were inadequate to protect the colonies during the time which must necessarily elapse before we were able to send out a field force and to assume the offensive. We were advised that it was possible for us by sending out reinforcements of moderate size to make the two colonies perfectly safe. We took the best military advice obtainable as to the number of the reinforcements which it was necessary to send out for that purpose. We sent out those reinforcements, and they arrived in South Africa before British territory was invaded by the Boer forces. There is another aspect of the matter which deserves your Lordships' attention. That is this. Supposing we had, as the noble Earl opposite suggests, as I understand—supposing we had during the summer, and when negotiations were still pending, made overt preparations for occupying the colonies on a large scale—

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I never contended that.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I think such a demand has been made.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Not during the negotiations. I never contended that.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I am sorry if I have misunderstood the noble Earl. According to my lights, if a certain demand had been made, accompanied by the preparation of a large and dominating force, that would only have had the effect of precipitating the negotiations, and at the same time, on the presumption that the Boers were preparing for hostilities, of inducing them to make an attack upon us.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Not during the negotiations.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I am sorry there is a misunderstanding.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: That was not my point.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: At any rate the noble Earl will not dispute that, if at the moment we had chosen to make large overt preparations in this country for war, clearly indicating to the world that we were about to coerce the South African Republic, at that moment it would have been possible for them to strike at us before we could possibly strike at them.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I did not mean that.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: We had this matter thoroughly considered by our military advisers, and we were told that it would take us at least thirteen weeks to land and concentrate and prepare a field force consisting of an army corps and a cavalry division in South Africa. During those thirteen weeks it is perfectly clear that it would have been in the power of the South African Republic to have taken the initiative. We knew that nothing we could do would deprive them of that advantage, and we considered that it would be better to limit ourselves to those purely defensive measures to which we actually limited ourselves, and which were thought sufficient for securing the two colonies against attack. I have only to add that if your Lordships should desire these matters to be more thoroughly investigated, I shall be ready to follow the noble Lords opposite into any details as to which they may require information. For the present I hope I have said enough to show your Lordships, in the first place, that we were not, as has been alleged, unprepared, and, in the next place, that we had excellent reasons for not pushing our preparations at first further than we actually did. It remains for me only to repeat what has been said already by more than one noble Lord, and to express my deep acknowledgments, in the first place, to the people of this country for the manner in which they have supported us in all our military preparations, and in the next place to the citizens of our great colonies for the extraordinary loyalty which they have shown, and the extreme generosity with which they have placed the whole of their resources at our disposal: and, finally, I must say one word to those numerous members of the civil population who have by contributions of all kinds, and particularly in the matter of hospitals, done so much to diminish the sufferings of our troops and secure the success of our military operations.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: Could the noble Marquess tell us the day on which he proposes to make his statement?

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I am not in a position to name a date now, but I can assure the noble Earl that it will be a very early date.

On question, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty in reply to her gracious speech," agreed to, nemine dissente, and same ordered to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

ELECTIONS.

Ordered, That all Members who are returned for two or more places in any part of the United Kingdom do make their election for which of the places they will serve, within one week after it shall appear that there is no question upon the return for that place ; and if anything shall come in question touching the return or election of any Member, he is to withdraw during the time the matter is in debate ; and that all Members returned upon double returns do withdraw till their returns are determined.

Resolved, That no Peer of the Realm, except such Peers of Ireland as shall for the time being be actually elected, and shall not have declined to serve, for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, hath any right to give his vote in the election of any Member to serve in Parliament.

Motion made and Question proposed—
“That it is a high infringement of the liberties and privileges of the Commons of the United Kingdom for any Lord of Parliament, or other Peer or Prelate, not being a Peer of Ireland at the time elected, and not having declined to serve for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, to concern himself in the election of Members to serve for the Commons in Parliament, except only any Peer of Ireland, at such elections in Great Britain respectively, where such Peer shall appear as a candidate, or by himself, or any others, be proposed to be elected ; or for any Lord Lieutenant or Governor of any county to avail himself of any authority derived from his commission, to influence the election of any Member to serve for the Commons in Parliament.”—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

“To leave out the words from the word ‘kingdom,’ in line 2, to the word ‘for,’ in line 8.”—(Mr. James Louther.)

Question put—“That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

 Mr. James Lowther and Sir Wilfrid Lawson.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That it is a high infringement of the liberties and privileges of the Commons of the United Kingdom for any Lord of Parliament, or other Peer or Prelate, not being a Peer of Ireland at the time elected, and not having declined to serve for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, to concern himself in the election of Members to serve for the Commons in Parliament, except only any Peer of Ireland, at such elections in Great Britain respectively where such Peer shall appear as a candidate, or by himself, or any others, be proposed to be elected; or for any Lord Lieutenant or Governor of any county to avail himself of any authority derived from his commission, to influence the election of any Member to serve for the Commons in Parliament.

Resolved, That if it shall appear that any person hath been elected or returned a Member of this House, or endeavoured so to be, by bribery, or any other corrupt practices, this House will proceed with the utmost severity against all such persons as shall have been wilfully concerned in such bribery or other corrupt practices.

WITNESSES.

Resolved, That if it shall appear that any person hath been tampering with any witness, in respect of his evidence to be given to this House, or any Committee thereof, or directly or indirectly hath endeavoured to deter or hinder any person from appearing or giving evidence, the same is declared to be a high crime or misdemeanour; and this House will proceed with the utmost severity against such offender.

Resolved, That if it shall appear that any person hath given false evidence in any case before this House, or any Committee thereof, this House will proceed with the utmost severity against such offender.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

Ordered, That the Commissioners of the Police of the Metropolis do take care that, during the Session of Parliament, the passages through the streets leading to this House be kept free and open, and that no obstruction be permitted to hinder the passage of Members to and from this House, and that no disorder be allowed in Westminster Hall, or in the passages leading to this House, during the sitting of Parliament, and that there be no annoyance therein or thereabouts; and that the Sergeant at Arms attending this House do communicate this Order to the Commissioners aforesaid.

VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS.

Ordered, That the Votes and Proceedings of this House be printed being first perused by Mr. Speaker; and that he do appoint the printing thereof; and that no person but such as he shall appoint do presume to print the same.

PRIVILEGES.

Ordered, That a Committee of Privileges be appointed.

OUTLAWRIES BILL.

"For the more effectual preventing Clandestine Outlawries," read the first time; to be read a second time.

Ordered, That the Journal of this House, from the end of the last session to the end of the present session, with an Index thereto, be printed.

Ordered, That 500 copies of the said Journal and Index be printed by the appointment and under the direction of Sir Reginald Francis Douce Palgrave, K.C.B., the Clerk of this House.

Ordered, That the said Journal and Index be printed by such person as shall be licensed by Mr. Speaker, and that no other person do presume to print the same.

RESIGNATION OF THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. SPEAKER acquainted the House that he had received a letter from Sir Reginald Francis Douce Palgrave, K.C.B.,

Library, House of Commons,
30th January, 1900.

Sir,

I have the honour to acquaint you that as I have been more than forty-six years in the service of the House of Commons, of which the last thirty-one years were devoted to the work at the Table of the House, I desire to resign the Patent whereby Her Majesty assigned to me the office with which I have been so highly honoured, of Clerk of the House of Commons.

Severance from the performance of such distinguished duties, and, on my part, so long continued, must occasion regret, and pain, but I shall be able to retain in cordial remembrance a grateful sense of the generous consideration shown me by yourself and your predecessors in the Chair, and by the honourable Members who have sat in the eleven Parliaments during which I have been permitted to offer my services to the House of Commons.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your obedient humble servant,
REGINALD F. D. PALGRAVE.

The Right Honble.

The Speaker of the House of Commons,
&c. &c. &c.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I beg to give notice that on Thursday next I shall move a vote of thanks to Sir Reginald Palgrave, late Clerk of the House.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

FIRST DAY'S DEBATE.

MR. SPEAKER reported Her Majesty's Speech, and read it to the House.

*CAPTAIN PRETYMAN (Suffolk, Wood-bridge): It is a kindly custom of this House to regard with special indulgence the Member to whom is entrusted the duty which I have to discharge to-day, and I feel sure that I shall have given me even double indulgence because the occasion is not an ordinary one, and I cannot and do not pretend to have that special knowledge which alone would enable me to do full justice to it. Ordinarily our discussions here are upon controversial matters. As mover of the Address it is difficult to be non-controversial without being colourless. But to-day there is common ground I shall have to traverse, and there are feelings which we shall all share on whichever side of the House we sit. The first of these feelings is that of deep sympathy, which it is our privilege to express, as representing the nation, with all sufferers by the war which is going on in South Africa. It will hardly be necessary to enumerate the sufferings which are in the minds of everyone of us here, but I think we must first refer to those who are suffering from wounds and from bodily disablement. Then, Sir, our sympathy must go out to those who are bereaved, to the widow and childless, and also to the weary watchers who have their dear ones at the front, and who are daily waiting for news—painful news such as we received this morning, and which carries sorrow and distress into many a home. There is one other expression of sympathy which I am sure will not be wanting, and that is an expression of the deepest sympathy with the sufferings of colony of Natal. Half the colony is in the hands of the enemy, and not only have they put into the field a force far out of proportion to their numbers, but they have suffered grievous loss of property and life. I trust we may be in a position at the end of the war to recompense them for the losses and suffering they have experienced. We have also feelings of the deepest admiration for the gallantry which our soldiers have displayed. Whether it be in the gallant defence of Mafeking, or the no less gallant and protracted defence of Ladysmith, or in the gallant action of Wauchope and the Highland Brigade at Magersfontein, where so many lost their lives, the story is the same, and it is a story of which we are all proud. It is our only regret that so many of those to whom our pride goes out are lost for ever. In addition to that we have another common ground. We have pride not only in the gallantry that this contest has evoked, but also in the national spirit which has been evinced. That national spirit is not confined to the British Islands. It has found expression to the utmost bounds of this Empire. If we look at the present position of the Empire as a whole, we may say with truth we have set a girdle round the globe, and every link rings true and clear at this moment. I believe when this war is over we may look forward to South Africa being peaceful and tranquil and contented, and that any rift which may exist can and will be repaired in a way which will cause less offence and less trouble in the future. Although at the end of the war there will, no doubt, remain a certain amount of race antagonism, which is the natural result of a contest of this description, we shall at any rate have purged the contempt with which that race antagonism was previously associated; the races will have learned to respect one another, and will be able to live side by side in amity, the hatreds of the past being merged into a mutual liking. Contempt is the kindling which fans antagonism into flame; and it was that contempt combined with race antagonism which brought about the present conflict. When the struggle is concluded let us hope that the contempt which has arisen from surface causes will have been purged, that Boer and Briton will live side by side in peace, and that both will have a great future before them under the British flag. One other feeling we have in common, and that is the feeling of regret for the reverses which we have suffered in South Africa. Further than that we have the unanimous determination to retrieve those reverses. We wish to examine and to investigate the causes of the reverses and the failures, if they may be so called, which have occurred in our campaign. I am here, perhaps, on delicate ground, but I think I may say this. We may ask ourselves with advantage whether our weakness or our failures, if I may use that word, are due to any deep-seated and inherent national weakness, or to temporary and removable causes. I think the latter can only be the answer. The Empire and the resources of the nation were never stronger than at this moment, but our power does not lie on the surface. It is deep-seated, and the causes which we have to inquire into if they are temporary and removable must be inquired into with a view to their being removed. I feel sure that no obstacle will be thrown in the way, but that the Government will welcome an inquiry in any form which may be agreeable to the House and which will enable us to discover the causes of the difficulty, and to remove them. There is one consideration which occurs to me, and that is that of "inadequate preparation." Is that one of the principal causes for our difficulties? I would rather say it is not so much inadequate preparation as the insufficient estimate of the forces arrayed against us. In the case of the Crimean war the preparations were inadequate for any war, but I doubt if we were ever so well prepared to undertake a campaign on a certain scale as when this war broke out three months ago. If there was a fault it was the under-estimate of the forces arrayed against us, and it will be for us to consider how the under-estimate arose. There are many factors to be considered, some of which are new, but I think that we shall find—or, at any rate, it so appears to me—that those factors in themselves were to a certain extent foreseen, and that there was some knowledge of them. But the result of the combination of all those factors and the strength of the enemy, from a defensive point of view, which we had to engage, was not foreseen or measured, so far as I am aware, by any person. The want of prophetic power was not confined to the Government alone, it was common to the country as a whole. That, at all events, was the impression at which I arrived in this House three months ago: that nobody on this or that side of the House, or in the country, had measured the strength of the enemy arrayed against us; or, if so, the expressions of opinion were few and far between. Who could have realised that this campaign would resolve itself into the taking of a series of natural fortresses of enormous strength, ably defended by troops of unexampled mobility, instructed by Continental experts, and armed with the most perfect weapons ever used in warfare? It is perhaps difficult to realise how small a factor will determine success or failure. Such a thing as a barbed wire fence may easily turn a victory into a defeat, and to sum up all these factors is almost impossible after fifty years of peace, which we have passed through, when many of these factors are to a large extent unknown. There has been some criticism in which I as an artilleryman feel particularly interested. Our field guns have been condemned on all sides because they are of less range than the guns of the enemy; but one thing has been forgotten, and that is that our field guns have been compared with guns of the enemy, which are guns of position and not field guns at all, and for an artilleryman to estimate the efficiency of a field gun solely by its range is—I should look on

—as very much the same thing as a press-man who would judge the merits of a newspaper solely by its circulation. The situation is a most grave one, but it has its better side: I do not think that the resources of our opponents were immediately realised. The Boer Republic had formed itself into a vast military machine, every part of which was perfect; our military machine was imperfect in the sense that our resources had not been called together. Is it therefore any wonder that the smaller perfect machine should for the moment be successful? But we have resources, and I hope that this House will support the Government in bringing every one of those resources into action to bring about our supremacy. They are only just now coming into play, and although we have now been checked more than once, when once the ring is broken the collapse may be as sudden as our progress, up to the present, has been slow. The last struggle for the relief of Ladysmith, it was hoped, would be the beginning of the end, as it is only the end of the beginning. But this House has not only to consider the cause of the difficulty, but the cause and the motive which led up to the war itself. Here I am on very delicate ground, and it would not become me in the duty I have to perform to-day to examine the questions which have been, and which will have to be, discussed here; but I should like to make one observation. Although some may attribute a motive to this or that person or politician, I think we may all agree that the national motive for this war is a pure and just one. The motive which has for centuries animated this country, and which animates it now, is that we shall obtain justice and freedom for all races and all creeds. That is the great stream in which our national sentiment has run in the past and is running now. It will always occur that where there is a great stream of pure water there will be draining into it streams which are not so pure as the river itself, and no doubt uses will be made and motives attributed that do not exist. The motive that animates us here, and the House and country generally, is to restore peace and freedom to all throughout South Africa. So far as I have observed that is the motive animating us all, and although we may have to engage our attention with that legislation which we are more accustomed to consider, our hearts will be with our soldiers in South Africa. But that is no reason why we should not consider other measures. We have submitted to us to-day no measures of heroic legislation or costly legislation. The only costly legislation will be the estimates for the war in South Africa. Last year the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer asked for a vote of eight millions. He would be a bold man who would say how much we shall be asked for this session. But whatever is asked for I hope will be cheerfully given. We cannot set money against the lives of our fellow subjects now being risked in South Africa. We shall be asked to sanction measures of improving and remodelling the Companies Act, and that a matter we shall gladly do because we know the loss which is suffered by those who are induced to part with their money under false pretences by fraudulent companies. Another measure we shall be asked to consider is what is called an Agricultural Holdings Bill, and anything that this House can do towards the improvement of our agriculture will be greatly welcomed. We have, however, to remember that the conditions of our agricultural industry vary greatly in different parts of the country. We have also to consider the incoming tenant as well as the outgoing tenant. Sir, the situation before us is indeed a serious and a difficult one. It is, perhaps, the most serious and, perhaps, the most difficult situation which this country has had to face since the earliest years of the century. This is, indeed, a momentous session. Our ill-wishers, we know, are looking eagerly for any signs of weakness, of vacillation, or of disunion within these walls. On the other hand, the country, and the Empire in arms, are looking to us to express their unanimous determination to bring this struggle to a successful issue. Now, Sir, I need hardly ask the House to which of these we should afford satisfaction. The question can have but one answer. Therefore, I trust that the touchstone of all criticism will be not party advantage, but the needs and necessities of the Empire.

MR. H. P. PEASE (Darlington): In rising to second the address I claim the indulgence of the House on similar grounds to those enunciated by my hon. friend, and also for what I may consider a weightier reason, that I have never before taken part in a debate. Impressed by the consciousness of my own inexperience, I ask for that consideration which the House so generously extends. My hon. friend has referred to points in the Queen's Speech; but I propose to deal with some of those with which he has not dealt. Sir, it was with feelings of satisfaction that the nation received the news that a treaty had been concluded between this country and the German Emperor. It appears to me that this is additional evidence of the friendliness of the great German Empire towards us whose commercial interests are so closely bound up with our own. I observe that there is a Bill to be brought in this session with reference to the Federation of Australia. I believe that there is no announcement in the Queen's Speech that will give greater satisfaction. It is the fulfilment of a dream of far-seeing Imperial statesmen and of many of those who do not take great interest in other political questions. I believe, Sir, that that long-cherished idea being brought to a conclusion is the cause of great satisfaction to our colonists, and it is a satisfaction that is all the deeper because the change has been brought about by the wish and the action of those colonists themselves. It has come to maturity through them. I believe, Sir, that the result of this spontaneous co-operation will be to provide means whereby these colonies will be able to defend themselves in the future, and that they will be able to take such action in making representations to the mother country in reference to trade—which is such an important factor between us—as will lead to our mutual benefit. And I believe that such is the wish of the people of the United Kingdom. Sir, I must make some small reference to the very sad events which are happening in India at the present time with regard to the plague and famine. I congratulate the Government of this country upon having such an administrator at the head of affairs as we have in Lord Curzon. I am sure that the House will feel, as I do, that in him we have a man who grasps the situation, and one who will do all he can to help those unfortunate people who are suffering from plague or from famine. As has been said by my hon. friend, and as mentioned in the Queen's Speech, the time is not propitious for legislation requiring great grants of money; but there are several Bills which will be brought in which are of great importance. There is the law governing limited liability companies, which my hon. friend has dealt with. I think it would not be wise that any legislation should be introduced which would prove of a vexatious character; but at the same time, there is a crying need for legislation by way of amendment of the laws relating to limited liability companies. We have lately seen many prospectuses issued which have been a perfect disgrace to those who sent them. Then there is an important Bill with regard to technical and secondary education which is to come before this House. This is a measure which I think the vast majority of Members are greatly interested in. I presume the objects of the Bill will be to bring within the province of the Government so important a factor as secondary education; and I trust the Government will have the support of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Aberdeen, who has done so much for secondary and commercial education, both by his Commission and also by his article in the North American Review, which has been so widely read. There is also a measure to be introduced with reference to the Housing of the Working Classes; and I believe the whole of the House will agree with me that this is a very important Bill. It is one that demands our earnest attention. The evil of overcrowding, especially in the North of England, is great in populous areas; and the powers of the local authorities must be so defined as will lead to the diminution of the evil in these areas. It appears to me that the remedy is a very simple one, and it is very desirable that the powers of the local authorities should be increased so that this crying evil shall be reduced to a minimum. Sir, with reference to the other Bills, I will not trouble the House with any remarks. I must ask you, however, to bear with me while I make a few remarks with regard to the war. In the closing year of a century which has been so conspicuous for the march of civilisation, and also for the development of our moral and religious progress, it seems to me sad that we should find ourselves involved in a great war, especially as but twelve months ago we were warmly welcoming the rescript of the Tsar. At the same time, I believe the nation's eyes are open at the present moment to the fact that we are, as the right hon. Gentleman oppositesaid the other day, "engaged in a just and necessary war." I do not believe it is a war so much for the supremacy of British interests as it is a war for the supremacy of right and the suppression of wrong. I believe, Sir, that this war, which has been so disastrous hitherto, will bear good fruit in the future. It was alleged not very long ago that this was a war of greed for territory and lust for gold. I think recent evidence has shown that this was not the case. I verily believe that the wishes of the Boers have never been to secure a peaceful settlement of the difficulty, but to overthrow the dominion of the Queen. I do not propose on this occasion to deal with any of the criticisms which have been hurled at the Government over this controversy, because I do not consider it within my province to do so. It is not my duty to deal with controversial matters. I do not speak for the Government, but I shall not be indulging in any indiscretion if I state in public that the last thing the Government desire to do is to conceal any knowledge in reference to this campaign, and if a public inquiry is desired it will certainly not be refused. It would not be within my province, nor would it be wise for me to speculate as to the future of South Africa; but as the whole policy of this country has been in the direction of the development of our colonies, close knit by the closest ties, always under the national flag, I trust that the opportunity will arise, when this war has been brought to a conclusion in the only way that the nation will allow, when peace has been restored, that the same blessings and advantages may be assured for all time to all the inhabitants of those unfortunate territories whose only bar to progress has been that they have been denied that equity of administration and stability of rule which have been the crowning glory of every community over which our flag flies. Sir, in seconding the Address I wish to note that Her Gracious Majesty has expressed her great gratification at the spontaneous loyalty of our colonies and the great bravery of our colonial troops in the present struggle. I think that we, as the representatives of this nation, should re-echo that expression. We trust that the link which binds us will be more firmly welded together in the future and never be broken; and we know that the memory of that spontaneous loyalty, self-sacrifice and devotion to Imperial interests will never die.

Motion made and Question proposed—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as followeth:—

Most Gracious Sovereign,

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament."—(Captain Pretyman).

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I am confident that the whole House will join with me in congratulating the two hon. Members on the manner in which they have discharged the duty imposed upon them. The ability which they have shown and the tone which they preserved were alike worthy of all praise. The hon. and gallant Member for the Woodbridge Division of Suffolk is one whom we always listen to with admiration and with such a degree of pleasure as the peculiar character of his favourite topic allows us to experience. The hon. and gallant Gentleman is a past master in the law of death duties, not an exhilarating topic at the best, but now that bimetallism is dead and gone the death duties hold the field above all Parliamentary subjects in point of incomprehensibility, and I hope that when the hon. and gallant Gentleman next addresses us he will find a theme of more interest for the general body of Members of the House. As regards the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, he comes to us recommended by the memory of his father, for many years a respected Member of this House, and he has the advantage not only of this inheritance but of the broader and more disengaged view of things which comes from belonging to a family which is not tied by any lazy uniformity of political opinion. The hon. Members may be sure we shall always be pleased to welcome their intervention in our

debates. On the gracious Speech itself I will only make this remark, that I have seldom known so little said in such a large number of words. But I make no complaint of it either on the ground of the paucity of its topics or the poverty of its promises for legislation. We are in a state of war, and as the war advances it seems to become more serious, more anxious, and even more critical, and I am not surprised that the Government turned away from the idea of proposing any formidable programme of legislative measures. The affairs of South Africa, political and military, will undoubtedly engage the attention of this Parliament to a very great extent, and the modest tale of legislative work which is promised to us—although I must say there are some very remarkable omissions from it—will, I believe, suffice for the energies of Parliament during this session. As to the measure promised for the federation of certain Australian colonies, it will be received with the greatest satisfaction. We have long followed with interest and with hope the efforts made for this great and beneficial object, and if, after so long delay, this year sees that object accomplished, I am sure there will be sincere rejoicing on all hands. The language of the paragraph relating to India does not at all exaggerate either the gravity of the situation or the regret and sympathy for the people of India which are universally felt in this country. That the calamity of famine should be superadded to the already existing scourge of plague is, indeed, a terrible misfortune; but we must hope that the measures taken by the capable officers of the Indian Government will enable them to cope with this difficulty and with this great evil. The last of those topics to which I would refer is the question of Samoa and Tonga, of which I will only say that we shall require further explanation of it before we can form a judgment upon it. Now I turn to that which is, after all, the subject uppermost in our minds. It is impossible for us to come together to-day without contrasting our position now with the circumstances under which we parted at the end of October. We had then only recently become involved in this war with the two South African Republics. The earliest engagements had been fought during the brief session of Parliament, and, brave as we knew our foemen to be, and formidable as might be the nature of the country, the universal expectation was that we should soon have present in South Africa such a number of our troops as to enable them rapidly to advance into the interior and to clear the Queen's dominions of the invader. Ah! I am afraid that our expectations are greatly sobered since that time. Week after week we have met—I have not the courage of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, and I hesitate to use the word "reverses"—with checks and disappointments accompanied by deplorable loss of life, and now there is no apparent indication that we have advanced any practical step towards the attainment of the object in view. The enemy is in occupation at this moment of a larger extent of the Queen's territory than he had then overrun, and although some of our forces have in certain quarters made considerable advances, in every instance their further progress is stayed by the resistance of great bodies of men in situations all but impregnable. Our people have been subjected during the last three months to a most severe test and trial, a trial, let me say in passing, which has not been made at all easier for them by the scrappy and imperfect manner, in some cases apparently the reluctant manner, and in others the perplexing manner, with which news has been communicated to them. Now, it is unnecessary, and if we wish to retain the goodwill of anybody in the world it is surely most undesirable, that we should pursue a practice which we have too often been in the habit of pursuing—namely, imputing to ourselves a larger share of manly virtues than our neighbours possess. But there is one thing we can do without offence to anyone—we may compare ourselves with ourselves, and, going back over our long history, as once and again we have come through perils and disaster greater than these, borne with courage and composure, so now I think we may say that our people in this instance and in this severe ordeal have not fallen short of the high traditions of our nation. The courage and fortitude of the British soldier were never more conspicuous than in this war, and when I speak of his courage and fortitude I wish to associate with him his comrades who are sons of the colonies, whether African, American, or Australian, and who have shown not only equal qualities of a military kind, but an extraordinary aptitude for the particular kind of warfare in which they are engaged. And, on the other hand, on their side the British people have sustained their character by the generally calm, equal, and determined mind which they have been able to preserve under heavy trials and anxieties. I think it is but right—and the hon. and gallant Gentleman eloquently discharged his part of this—it is but right that the House of Commons should make a full and grateful recognition of these facts, and we should not do justice to our feelings if we did not also express our deep sorrow for the sufferings endured by our gallant countrymen in the field and by their anxious relatives at home, and also our heartfelt sympathy with all who are mourning the loss of those dear to them. In yet another matter I think we shall be all of one mind. We can all appreciate and admire the fine spirit of gallantry and devotion which have led numbers of our countrymen within the last two or three weeks to spontaneously offer their services for the war. I think we shall have to be informed of the reasons which have necessitated this unusual method of reinforcing our Army in South Africa by transforming one kind of force into another kind of force, and by employing for the purposes of active service at the other side of the world members of our domestic Army of defence. We shall also probably be told under what authority, statutory or other, all this has been done. But while these are questions which are natural and proper to be asked, and while they will necessarily be answered, there will be no discord whatever in our note of admiration for the men themselves who have answered to the call. The hon. and gallant Gentleman said he was glad that he was on common ground. Now, Sir, I wish to keep on common ground as long as possible between the two sides of the House, and for a moment more I am able to do so. I repeat, on my own part and on behalf of those for whom I am entitled to speak, our readiness to support the prosecution of this war with vigour and with unstinted means, in order that as rapidly as possible the integrity of the Queen's dominions may be vindicated and a successful issue attained. For that purpose I imagine there will be no difficulty in obtaining the additional supplies that may prove to be necessary. But when I pass to another part of this great subject, I am sorry to say my agreement with Her Majesty's Government ceases. When I look to the circumstances antecedent to the war, when I consider the conception that Her Majesty's Government appear to have formed from their very first accession to office of the proper spirit in which to approach this great South African problem, when I contemplate the tone and temper with which they conducted their negotiations not only with the Transvaal Republic but with our Dutch fellow-subjects at the Cape, and when, further, I see the evidence now before us of the narrowness of their provision of the military requirements arising out of hostilities—hostilities which their policy made possible, and which their mode of furthering their policy made probable—then I am constrained to open condemnation of their administration of affairs. I believe that this feeling is largely shared in the House, and that being so I am glad that my noble friend near me will to-night make a motion which will give us all an opportunity to express and to record our opinion on this momentous subject. Now, let me anticipate one argument which possibly may be used. We shall be told that this is not the time for criticism. Are we to be told that when we are all patriotically united in supporting the war, criticism is out of place, and that our objections, however serious, ought to be deferred until the war is over? That is a theory which I altogether repudiate and dispute. This is the very time for effective criticism, and those of us who wish to disclaim responsibility for the policy of the Government must and ought to do so now; and I need hardly point out that the convenient season of which we hear so much might never occur, or when it did come the matter would be stale and unprofitable. An ingenious friend of mine, well known to everyone in the House, referring to this subject the other day, described to me the sort of thing that would probably occur. In a homely metaphor he spoke of it as "mustard after dinner." I am bound to say that although this theory is urged strongly in the press and elsewhere on the supporters of the Government, those supporters are in this matter, as I suspect they often are in other matters, more loyal than the King. I must admit that right hon. Gentlemen opposite, so far from deprecating criticism, have openly invited it.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BAUFOR, Manchester, E.): Hear, hear.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: In this the Colonial Secretary has acted in accordance with opinions which he expressed many years ago. I have found some language of his—and by quoting it I pay the right hon. Gentleman the greatest compliment I can pay him; it is no tu quoque, but, on the contrary, it shows how the right hon. Gentleman preserves an even mind in this matter—in the report of a debate almost exactly analogous to this. It was in 1878. Does the right hon. Gentleman object?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): Oh, no.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Does the right hon. Gentleman object to it as being too recent or too far back? I will give him the choice of the evils. These are the words used by him in 1878—

"Some hon. Members have invented a convenient theory by which opposition is silenced in the presence of foreign complications. If we attempt discussion before war breaks out we are hampering the Government in negotiations and endangering peace. If we wait till the war is upon us, then it is said that in an unpatriotic way we are dividing the country in the presence of the enemy; while if we postpone discussion until the war is over, we are told we are guilty of futile fault-finding and unnecessary retrospection. The thing, in fact, comes to this—that it is not the business of the House of Commons or the people to express an opinion on foreign affairs. This should be left to the responsible advisers of the Crown."

That is a complete answer to all those tirades in the newspapers challenging our conduct to which we have been accustomed, and I quote it because it shows how consistent the right hon. Gentleman can be when he chooses. Now, Sir, having disposed of that preliminary objection, and looking back over the 4½ years during which the present Government have had charge of this matter—4½ years which I cannot think they themselves can contemplate with much pride, and which certainly have not yet culminated in a triumph, looking back upon them—I find that the key-note of the whole history is to be found in the phrase used by my right hon. friend the Member for East Fife a few weeks ago, when he said that the negotiations were poisoned by suspicion. I will not go into the circumstances which may have created, if they did not fully justify, the intense suspicion which the Boers entertained of designs against their independence. I merely state the fact that the suspicion existed and exists. Surely that is indisputable. It has become a suspicion, not so much against us, not so much against our Government, not so much even against the Imperial authorities at the Cape, as against certain powerful personages who are supposed to be extremely influential in this matter, and who, either in pursuit of their own personal pecuniary advantage or in following some ambitious scheme, did desire to break in upon the integrity and independence of the South African Republic. The Boers were right if they did not direct their suspicions in a great degree against the people of this country, because the mass of ordinary Englishmen had no desire to take either an inch of their territory or an item of their liberties from them. The ordinary Englishman wished to see the States and colonies of South Africa living in harmony and peace among themselves. But no one can deny that the Boers had ground for suspicion from the quarter to which they mainly directed their attention. Who can doubt, Sir, that the wise course for a Minister to take was to avoid every step that could possibly aggravate or encourage that suspicion, to disclaim not only connivance in or knowledge of any designs against their independence, but to disclaim approbation of or sympathy with the authors of those designs, and thus to pave the way to a better understanding? Why should we take so much trouble, why should we go out of our way, why should we go almost any length in order to establish more confident relations with the Boer Republic? I have often heard them spoken of as a little State on our borders, in some degree, more or less, independent, with which we were unfortunately engaged in controversy, but whose friendship was not, after all, very material to us. But that is a total mistake. This is a community not only with a racial affinity to our own fellow subjects, but almost in solidarity with them by reason of intermarriage and constant intercommunication. Seeing that, as it has been well said, the Dutch and the English must live together at the Cape, surely the first thing to do is to take this root of bitterness away from among them. My complaint against the right hon. Gentleman is that, so far from this evil having been mitigated under his guidance, it has actually been materially increased. I have referred to the dictum—and a very wise dictum—that the Dutch and English must live together at the Cape, and even after your negotiations and after your war, whatever the result may be, they must live together. But there are other grounds on which I cannot give my confidence to the right hon. Gentleman, and again I invoke the ordinary Englishman who may be taken as expressing in a complete form the national conscience and to some extent the national intelligence, and I affirm that, whatever his feelings may be at this moment with the war upon us, in quiet times the ordinary Englishman has no desire whatever that men of British descent should lord it over men of Dutch descent, and he has just as little desire that men of Dutch descent should lord it over men of English descent. That the Imperial authority should be maintained as the supreme authority we are all agreed. But in the individual States the right hon. Gentlemen opposite and their supporters have found a most convenient formula in talking of equal rights for white men. Well, I am glad to find the party opposite are so anxious for equal rights among white men. When they have done with it in South Africa perhaps they will kindly transfer that doctrine to this country, where there are many instances in which it could be applied. But the value of equal rights for white men, when you have attained them, depends very much upon the way in which they are used; and I find now that the organs of public opinion in South Africa which have supported and incited the policy of the Government from the first are hinting at the suspension of the Constitution of Cape Colony. Why? Because the Dutch have a majority in it. They claim openly—I have read articles and letters to that effect—that when the arrangements after a successful war are made there should be some re-arrangement of the boundaries, or in some other way a contrivance should be made which would secure them from such a catastrophe in the future as a Dutch majority at the Cape. Do not let it be supposed for a moment that I do right hon. Gentlemen opposite the dishonour of supposing that they have any personal sympathy with any such monstrous proposals as these, but I assert that their policy has been infected by this spirit, and that too little consideration has been shown from first to last with the loyal Dutch in the colony, whose good faith and friendliness have been put to a strain beyond all measure; and also I say that under the régime of the right hon. Gentleman the Ministers of Cape Colony, who are as much Ministers of the Queen as he is, have been treated with a coolness little calculated to allay doubts and fears, and also little calculated to retain that good feeling which is essential, not only for good government generally, but especially for any satisfactory settlement of the future of South Africa. Sir, I have thought it right frankly to give these broad indications of two of the principal grounds upon which I say I am opposed to the general policy of Her Majesty's Government. But I am well aware that this is not the part of the subject which the public cares most about just now. It is the war, the course of the war, and the provision made for the effective prosecution of the war, in which the country is interested at this moment. Now, in regard to these we had no opportunity of obtaining much insight into the Ministerial mind when Parliament was sitting in October, but the recess, with its speeches, has brought us enlightenment, and we have gone on from astonishment to astonishment. It would be interesting to trace, if we could, the phases of feeling and of opinion in the Ministerial mind as disclosed by what we have been told during the recess. To begin with, there is the initial and rudimentary question—Was there to be war at all? It is now said that war was inevitable. That is obviously an ex post facto opinion. Some right hon. Gentlemen object to being saddled with an afterthought, so I will express very much the same thing in a more formal manner. If it was not an ex post facto opinion they would be hopelessly condemned, because if, during last summer, they thought war was inevitable, and yet they went on with their negotiations in the way they did, and pursued

them in the manner they did, then I do not hesitate to say, putting aside altogether the disrespectful manner in which they treated this House and the country, that they ought on that hypothesis to be hurled from power. No, they did not know it; they could not have known it. Then did they look upon the war as probable? What I say of that is, that there was nothing whatever in the merits of the question with which they were dealing in their controversy with the Transvaal in which could be found a casus belli, and if there was no reason for war, equally there was no reason for special military preparations. I do not think this will be denied, because there is surely no one who says we ought to have gone to war on the question of seven or five years residence before you could acquire the right of enfranchisement in the South African Republic. I put that aside from the principle altogether. Therefore there was nothing to justify war, and nothing to justify preparations for war. That is a thing which in the course of last summer I repeated two or three times. I hold the opinion still. But if I was careful to say what I did as to preparations for war—that there was nothing to justify it then—the reason was that I wished, if possible, to stop the practice which the Government were pursuing of sending out week after week small detachments of men, small dribbles of force, which were certain to spoil their negotiations and lead to irritation, certain to throw doubt and discredit upon their professions of a sincere desire for a peaceful issue, and yet were ludicrously insufficient, absolutely futile, idle, trivial, and trumpery if they were intended to lend any substantial strength to the garrisons of the colony. If the object of the Government in sending out these small forces week after week was to give strength to the colony, then all I can say is that they must have known, or if they did not know they ought to have known, for they had the means, and they alone had the means of knowing, that it was a perfectly ludicrous measure to take from that point of view. And, therefore, we are driven to the conclusion that all they did was done with a view to frightening and coercing the Boers into submission. A more ludicrous conception of their antagonists and a more complete miscalculation of the case we have never seen in any history. If, on this point of escaping war, the Government's idea was, and I believe it was, that they could frighten the Boers, and that the Boers did not really wish, and were not really ready, to go to war, then I should like to know who advised them in that matter, and who was it from whom only they could derive that impression. Was it our official representatives in any part of the Cape, or was it again those evil geniuses who have been hanging behind them all along, and to whose influence and advice we believe they were too ready to listen? We find that they were wrong as to the war, because they thought that there would be no war, and there is war. That is quite sufficient. They were wrong in their expectations. Then the next question which arose was this, If it comes to war, with whom shall we have to fight? Early in October there was a day of sad surprise for the First Lord of the Treasury when he opened his morning newspaper—if he ever does open his morning newspaper—and was obliged to exclaim, "What an extraordinary thing. The Orange Free State are joining the Boers. I should have sooner expected a declaration of war from Switzerland!" Sir, what a frame of mind; what an estimate of known facts; and what a depth of false information does this disclose!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is not my opinion.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: If it is not the right hon. Gentleman's opinion, he has very much misled everybody who has read his speeches. It is a great part of the case put forward by the Government that they did not expect the Free State would go to war. I say, first of all, there was the fact of the treaty of alliance between the two States, as to which there was no secret; but, putting that formal instrument aside, what is the case? The Government of the Free State had always been anxious to maintain peace, and they had exerted themselves with the greatest energy and ability in endeavouring to assist to a peaceful solution of the difficulty between us and the Transvaal. But if it came to a war in which the independence of the Boer Republic was to be staked, apart altogether from the question of blood affinity and the almost interchangeable character of the two communities, is it not natural that the Government of the Free State would say, "How shall we be left when this ends in the loss of their independence by the Boer Republic? We shall find ourselves one solitary State in South Africa, to be the next prey to the machinations of the very men to whom the Boers are now falling victims"? So far from being a cause for surprise, that was a most natural conclusion for them to come to. Their decision was one which I for one greatly deplored, but which at least caused me no surprise whatever. On this subject I can quote to the First Lord of the Treasury the opinion expressed by a most shrewd observer a few years ago, who was explaining what he thought it was reasonable to expect in the case of a war between the Boers and ourselves in South Africa. He said—

"Lord Salisbury no doubt has been consistent. He was in favour of the war in Zululand. He was in favour of the annexation of the Transvaal. He was in favour of maintaining the occupation of that country by force, even after it had become apparent that the annexation itself had been made on false information. If the Orange Free State had, as would most probably have been the case, joined with the Transvaal Boers, no doubt Lord Salisbury would have declared war upon it too, and if then the whole Dutch population of the Cape had risen Lord Salisbury would have, with a light heart, led this country into a war more serious in its consequences, more certain to be fruitless of good results, than any war in which we have been engaged since we tried to compel the allegiance of the American colonies."

If the First Lord of the Treasury and the Colonial Secretary wished to form a judgment on what would be the probable action of the Free State they should have read some of the earlier speeches of Mr. Chamberlain. Now, again I say, if the Government did not expect that the Free State would join the Boers against us, who advised them to that effect? Whose opinion was it on which they formed their judgment? Well, Sir, it comes to this, that the Government were mistaken as to the outbreak of war, and they were mistaken as to our antagonists in the war. Let us now see if they were more accurate in their foresight with regard to the requirements for the war. Sir, the outside world, in which I include all persons not in the inner circle of officialdom, were startled beyond measure when they found what the enormous military strength of the Boers was. There are controversies on this subject as to the time during which and the purposes for which those great armaments were required. But at present I put those controversies on one side, because I am dealing with the fact only that those armaments did exist. We see the number of men that they can put into the field; we see the abundance and excellence of the munitions of war, the military weapons, both great and small, which they have accumulated. The point I wish to push is, was the Government aware or not, say in the middle of last summer, of these great military resources of the Boers? Had the Intelligence Department of the War Office information on the subject? Did they know how many combatants the Boers could count upon; did they know of all the modern guns from Essen and Creusot, the Mauser rifles, and so forth? I should be much surprised if the Intelligence Department of the War Office, which is manned by capable officers and is always active and alert, did not know and was not in possession of the whole of this information in great detail. There was nothing of a surreptitious character about the acquirement of these munitions of war. I have been told—I cannot vouch for the correctness of it—that some of these great guns of which we stand so much in awe now were actually landed in Cape Town and passed up through the streets of Cape Town on their way to Pretoria. That was not surreptitious. But at all events we had our agents, military and civil, on the spot, and I should be altogether surprised if I am informed that the Intelligence Department of the War Office did not know every fact about them. It would be a serious matter if they did not. We may almost take it as certain that they did; but I ask the question. Well, then, did the Intelligence Department communicate this information to the Commander-in-Chief? Did he duly convey it to the Secretary of State? Did the Secretary of State dutifully submit it to the Cabinet Committee of Defence—that Aulic Council which the present Government has set up for the purpose of overriding the decisions of the Secretary of State for War and watering down his responsibility? The supreme apex of this hierarchical edifice is the Duke of Devonshire. Did the Duke of Devonshire receive the information and snatch a few moments from his educational functions in order to communicate it to his colleague, the Colonial Secretary, who was busy at that moment putting as many pin pricks as he could into the letters and speeches, with the help of which he was conducting his negotiations with the Transvaal Government? But if the Lord President did not receive the information, where did it stop in that hierarchical chain which I have described? That is a plain question which requires a plain answer, and I hope we shall have one. Again, it is a matter of common report that General Butler, Commander of the Forces in South Africa, sent home a minute, or despatch, or some document in which he set forth his view of the military situation, of the forces required to be employed, and the disposition which should be given to that force: Sir W. Butler is an excellent soldier, and also he is a man who, in previous years, had acquired a familiar acquaintance with South Africa. He was recalled and covered with obloquy, because it was believed he had been running counter to the policy of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Because he was an Irish gentleman and a Catholic.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Will these papers of his be produced?

Sir, we are entitled to demand that they shall be produced, and no excuse of the custom of the service or any excuse of that kind will avail, for it is to the interest of the country that the truth should be known. Now, on this question of the military resources of the Boers and the steps taken by the Government to meet them, the First Lord of the Treasury has been, as we might well expect, most fertile in explanations. The first plea of the First Lord to which I will refer was that the Government knew no more than "the man in the street," on which I would only say—and it is a sufficient reply—that if that were so it means a grave neglect of duty on the part of the Government, a grave neglect of the means and appliances for information with which they are furnished. But he has another plea, which is that they knew of the development of the military strength of the Boers, but that they could not venture to remonstrate with them because of the unfortunate Jameson raid, which furnished the excuse and pretext for them. I leave the House to reconcile these two pleas, which answer each other. The third plea is that the Government hoped that a settlement of the franchise question would tide over the year, and then at the end of the year—he did not tell us what would occur; he left us quite in the dark, but at the end of the year the Boers would be weaker and we should be stronger. But the last plea to which I will refer is the most astounding and the least admissible of all; it is the perfectly baseless plea—and to my astonishment the Secretary for the Colonies joins in it—that if the Government had come to the House of Commons and had proposed an adequate strengthening of the garrison they would not have had the support of the House of Commons. [AN HON. MEMBER: Shame!] I give to that assertion the flattest contradiction. I say that right hon. Gentlemen opposite are not entitled to impute either to us of the Opposition or to their own followers, who were expressly included in the imputation, any such conduct. If they had come to the House of Commons and had given us, who were entirely ignorant of it, an adequate idea of the great disproportion between the military strength of the Boers and the garrisons and defences of the colonies, and had asked for powers, they would have received those powers from this House. If they had not received them it would have been their clear duty, in the interests of the Empire and of the colonists, of those men to whom the hon. and gallant Member opposite very properly referred, the inhabitants of Natal, who have suffered so much from the war—in the interests of all these they were bound, in order to show that when they could not discharge their duty they failed to fulfil their position—they were bound to resign their office. But here, by the use of this plea—habemus confidentem reum—we have them confessing that which we are seeking to know, whether it is true or not—that, for fear of Parliamentary complications and difficulties, they were content to leave the colonies with this great avalanche of Boer power impending over them. But not only so, they chose that particular moment to enter upon and push with great acerbity a controversy with the Boer Government which was almost certain to start the avalanche, just as a pistol shot will start an avalanche in the Alps, and which has, as a matter of fact, brought the avalanche down. I think I have dealt with the leading excuses and pleas, and I think the First Lord of the Treasury will find it necessary to give some explanation more consistent and reasonable than he has yet been able to offer to us. I have only a few more words to say, and they will take the form, as a good deal of what I have been saying has taken the form, of questions, and they have regard to the actual conduct of the war. I was delighted, everyone was delighted, to find that certain members of the Government qualified to speak said, in effect, that the generals were to have a free hand. I never expected that the home Government or any members of it would interfere with any general in the field. They knew better. The First Lord of the Treasury has spoken of the "entanglement" of Ladysmith. Now that is a remarkable and significant word. It is not "accident," not "disappointment," not even "embarrassment," but "entanglement." We are entangled when taken hold of by something which against our will and intention prevents our freedom of movements. What anyone can see is that the position of Sir G. White with a large force at Ladysmith has had a most important effect—I will not use any stronger word—upon the campaign; that it has had the effect of altering altogether the original plan of military operations. We are aware from the despatch of Sir G. White that the occupation of Glencoe and Dundee was determined upon under the advice and at the instance of the civil Governor of Natal, and I wish to ask, in the first place, was that so, and was that step taken after consultation in any way with authorities at home? Was it sanctioned by the Government at home, and was the sanction of military authorities at home received before a conclusion was arrived at? Then I wish to ask, secondly, whether the accumulation of stores at Ladysmith and the detention of a large body of troops there were in any degree subject to similar influence? My last question is whether it was of his own accord and on purely military grounds that Sir Redvers Buller himself abandoned his original intention and went to Natal, taking a large force with him? I need hardly say that, while there should be desire in time of war to leave generals free to obey their own judgment, yet if there are extraordinary reasons for interfering with that freedom, then the interference had better come from the responsible Government at home than take place on the opinions and views of a colonial Government. Now I have concluded what I have to say, and I trust the right hon. Gentleman will pardon my many questions, though I cannot expect universal or general concurrence in the views I have expressed. I have merely stated my own views on certain points, but I believe there are many of these questions I have thought it my duty to raise which the whole country expected would be raised, and the whole country awaits the answers with anxiety.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am far from complaining, Sir, either of the number of questions the right hon. Gentleman has put to me, the character of those questions, or the tone in which he put them, and I propose to deal with those questions, if the House will allow me, at, I hope, not inadequate length. Before, however, I come to the main part of the right hon. Gentleman's attack, for attack it was, I join with him in congratulating my two hon. friends behind me upon the skill and success with which they have carried out the difficult and delicate task entrusted to them. The task is always difficult and always delicate, and when the House meets in so grave a position of public affairs and in an inevitable mood of sadness brought about by the loss of so many valuable lives, a heavier burden is thrown upon the mover and seconder of the Address than on an ordinary occasion. My two hon. friends, while not refusing to touch adequately our programme of legislation, have in the main confined their attention to that single, all-absorbing topic of which each one of us, and certainly not least Her Majesty's Government, think day and night—I mean the war. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, following, and rightly following, their example, was occupied with the same great theme, and to-night I shall be compelled by the turn the debate has taken to dwell upon criticisms upon what has happened before I turn to the more absorbing topic of what still remains to be done. But if I dwell, in reply to the right hon. Gentleman, chiefly on the past and say nothing about the future, I hope the House will not think on that account that we, the Government, are not far more concerned with that future than we are with any mere party conflict in this House, or with the task of defending ourselves against a criticism which, I venture to think, is singularly unfair in its character, but which, whether unfair or not, does little harm to those against whom it is directed; and, if it did do harm, that harm would be insignificant, immaterial, negligible in comparison with the great national issue we are called upon to face. The right hon. Gentleman, in a sentence which began with the true patriotic ring, told us that he and those for whom he speaks were determined to support the war by every means in their power, so long—as I understood him—so long as that war was confined to driving invaders from Her Majesty's dominions.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The words I used were that we would support the war, the vigorous prosecution of the war, or something to that effect, in order as rapidly as possible to vindicate the integrity of the Queen's dominions and attain a successful issue.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am glad I gave the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of repeating, and of repeating, so far as my memory goes, with perfect accuracy, that somewhat cryptic but most important announcement of policy. The right hon. Gentleman, as obviously he was bound to do, carefully considered the terms in which that announcement was made, and I think he was right. I interpret it, and I think the country will probably interpret that announcement, as indicating that the right hon. Gentleman promises his support should he be in Opposition, and even more effectually by his policy should he be in power, towards prosecuting the war so long as we are engaged in repelling invasion, but that he declines to commit himself, he declines deliberately to commit himself to any statement indicating that, in so far as he can exercise any control over the destinies of the country, the war shall proceed until we make ourselves absolutely supreme over the whole region of South Africa. Well, the right hon. Gentleman does not contradict my inference.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Now I know how to do it. You take a sentence your opponent has used, you misstate it—[“No, no.”]—let hon. and right hon. Gentlemen keep their equanimity—you misstate it, and then, when your opponent rises to give the exact words used, you express satisfaction that you have given him the opportunity of doing a thing he was under no necessity to do, and then put an entirely new, and an entirely different construction on what was said, reading into it anything you like, and then when your opponent is tired of getting up and sits still, then you say, “judging by his silence, I am not misrepresenting him.” The right hon. Gentleman will not succeed either in reading into my words anything not there, or in driving me to say anything I do not desire to say.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am sorry failed to satisfy the right hon. gentleman. I can assure him he has entirely satisfied me. I want no more than what he has told us. I have given him the opportunity of saying, if he wished to say it, that he intends, in so far as he can, to aid the war, in Opposition or in the Government, until that conclusion is reached to which I have referred, the complete supremacy of Great Britain in South Africa. I have given him the opportunity for saying that, and he has declined to say it.

AN HON. MEMBER: We seek no territory.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Perhaps I may remind the right hon. Gentleman of another passage, to the effect that we were all agreed that the Imperial authority must be the supreme authority in South Africa.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not wish to pursue the controversy. I will not say I have every reason to be satisfied, for I confess it comes to me with somewhat a shock of surprise and dismay that there should be this doubt of what is meant by active support of the war. Well, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to make an attack upon the diplomacy pursued by the Government, and in particular by my right hon. friend the Secretary for the Colonies, during the last five years. He called it inflicting pin-pricks, he used a great many hard words in regard to it, and he indicated, not for the first time, that in his opinion it was that diplomacy, the want of dexterity of that diplomacy, the roughness of that diplomacy, which caused, and which alone caused, the outbreak of hostilities between the Boer Republics and ourselves. I have several observations to make upon that matter. In the first place, this diplomacy has been before the country all these years, and the right hon. Gentleman has been in a position not merely to make an occasional Parliamentary criticism, but to call the whole policy in question by a vote of censure. I do not remember that that ever was done. It is to be done to-night—strengthened by the checks which this country has received in the field. The right hon. Gentleman feels himself in a position to do that which, by his own account, he ought to have done any time during the course of the last five years. I doubt whether the move will be more successful to-night than it would have been on any of these previous occasions, but on that matter I may have to say a word directly. But, still limiting myself to this attack on my right hon. friend's diplomacy, I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the Boers themselves, who have given an account—which at all events should commend itself to the right hon. Gentleman—of the causes which have produced these international difficulties. They do not stop at the year 1895, they have nothing to do with drafting the Amendment which is to be moved to-night by the noble Lord on that bench, they go right back through one British Administration after another, including all the Administrations of which the right hon. Gentleman has been an ornament. It has been the continuous course of that diplomacy right back from the beginning, for twenty or thirty years—for twenty years at least—it has been the course of that diplomacy for twenty years, not what my right hon. friend has done or said in the last three or four years, which has at last brought to a culmination the controversy between the two nations or the two races. I think the right hon. Gentleman on reflection will feel that history did not begin in 1895, though amendments have begun in reference to events since 1895, and that if he wants to study the causes which have led to the present state of things, the historic causes, he must of necessity go back into more distant days. Then the right hon. Gentleman, before coming to his criticisms of the war, made one further attack on my right hon. friend—well, I do not know whether it was an attack on my right hon. friend, but I presume it was an attack on the Government or some servant of the Government. He said that in certain un-named Cape newspapers articles had been appearing in which it was suggested that when the war was successfully terminated the Constitution of Cape Colony should be suspended and the Dutch population should be put under the heel of the English-speaking population. Well, I have not the least doubt that the right hon. Gentleman has accurately quoted those newspapers, though he did not tell us what they were, but may I ask how we are responsible for these utterances? What have we said to suggest that the object of the war, or one result of the war, is to produce inequality? Where have we said that the triumph of British arms is to be marked by the diminution of civil liberty? Sir, we have said, and we have said continuously and consistently, exactly the reverse. Whatever the right hon. Gentleman may choose to say with regard to South African journalists, I do beg that he will not interpolate his criticism on that body of men into an indictment of her Majesty's Government. We have not very much time before us, but I may incidentally observe that the right hon. Gentleman, who was very angry with me just now for giving the substance of his words before an audience which heard the words, and before the speaker of the words, who could correct me, quoted—no, not quoted, that is not what he has been doing, he has been attacking my right hon. friend for this or that want of tact and discretion in his despatches—he quoted not one single syllable in this House in support of that indictment, nor do I believe that such quotations could be made. The right hon. Gentleman left the question of diplomacy and came to the more absorbing topic, and, as I think, the far more relevant topic, of the conduct of the war, and, if I understood him rightly, he declared it was a monstrous heresy to assert that the war was an inevitable war. I understood the right hon. Gentleman to attack us for having said that, as the upshot and conclusion of all these negotiations, we could not conceal from ourselves now that the war probably was an inevitable war. Well, it is not only the Ministerial mind which has taken this curious twist, but the minds of some of the right hon. Gentleman's nearest friends and most devoted colleagues. I believe Lord Rosebery has taken this view; I believe the Member for Haddingtonshire has committed himself to such a statement; I rather think the Member for East Fife has committed himself to a similar statement; and I almost think that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton and the hon. Baronet the Member for the Berwick Division have spoken in similar language. All those persons have, as far as I can discover, gone through the same phases of opinion on this subject as the Government have gone through. We believed up to a very late date, not only that war could be avoided, but that probably war would be avoided. But on looking back over the whole history of the transactions, and on comparing subsequent statements made by Boer authorities, we have come to the conclusion that from the very beginning the Boer Government did not mean to make those concessions which, if they were not made, we always knew must lead to hostilities between the two countries.

Mr. A. J. Balfour.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is a strange request I am going to make of him, but would the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to repeat his statement?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Certainly.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It may be discourteous.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Oh, no; I assure the right hon. Gentleman it is not. What I said was that he had been criticising us for taking the view towards the end, or after the close of the diplomatic transactions, that war was inevitable, having held before that a different opinion. I went on to say that that was not an eccentricity of the Members sitting on this bench alone, but that the same phases of opinion had been gone through, in the same order as I understood it, by a great many distinguished gentlemen closely connected with the right hon. Gentleman upon that bench.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, no; I meant the statement in regard to the Boer Government.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I, at least, never entertained any doubt that, if the Boers persisted in refusing a reasonable measure of justice to the Uitlanders it would no doubt end in hostilities, and I remember saying so on some public occasion in July—I think it was about the 20th of July—holding, however, the hopeful opinion that those concessions would be made.

'AN HON. MEMBER: Which?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: When did I make the statement? It is a matter of opinion on which we need not enter now. Then the right hon. Gentleman having taken this view, having passed this criticism upon our changes of opinion as regards the inevitability of war, went on to attack the military preparations which we made during the months, I suppose, of July, August, and September, and he described us as through those months—he did not mention the months, but I imagine it was those he had in view—sending dribblets of men week by week into the colonies. We did nothing of the kind; the right hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken in his facts. I am quite sure the War Office would not have the slightest objection to laying a return on the table of the House showing the dates on which troops arrived in South Africa, or were sent from here, and, if my hon. friend will lay such a return, and hon. Gentlemen will take the trouble to study it, they will see that no accusation ever was less founded than this accusation of sending dribblets of men week by week into our colonies for the purpose of defending them. And let me remind him, when he denounces us for having sent 10,000 men into Natal, in September I think it was, and says that you cannot expect to carry on negotiations successfully if you take military steps of that kind, that the colony of Natal itself sent an earnest request to us that we should do so, and, in my opinion, we should have been committing a gross dereliction of duty if we had not responded to that call. Then the right hon. Gentleman asks us how we came to be ignorant of the intentions of the Orange Free State, and he misinterprets, quite unintentionally, some observations I made in a speech delivered on, I think, November 28, in which I expressed my surprise that the Orange Free State should have done a thing so risky for its own future as to join with the Transvaal against us. I was not thinking at that moment of diplomatic negotiations of such and such a week, or such and such a month. I was thinking of the broad fact that the Orange Free State had lived at peace with us, flourished side by side with us, not interfered with or threatened by us, year after year, and generation after generation; and I say it is not astonishing, ought not we to feel surprise, that a State like that, absolutely secure in our midst, should threaten its own existence, and its own future, by thus throwing in its lot with our enemy? That was the gist of my argument. On the diplomacy of the Orange Free State, with which I was not concerned at the moment I was speaking, the right hon. Gentleman has referred to a statement made by the President of the Orange Free State on August 28th to the Prime Minister of the Cape Colony with reference to the discussion about the importation of arms and ammunition—

“With reference to the discussion about the importation of arms and ammunition into the Orange Free State, I trust that no assurance is necessary upon my part to contradict the ridiculous, lying, and malicious rumours that there exists with this Government any desire or intention to take up arms in any aggressive or offensive manner against the British Government or any British colony or territory.”

So much for the diplomacy of the Orange Free State. Then the right hon. Gentleman comes to a very important question, namely the forces of the Boers, our knowledge of those forces, and the inference that we ought to have drawn from them. He speaks with innocent surprise, as if the first time we ever heard that the Boers were arming was subsequent to the display of military efficiency which they have shown since the war broke out; but the Government never concealed, not from themselves only, but from the House, that armaments on the most formidable scale had been and were being introduced into the Transvaal. My right hon. friend, I believe, in answer to questions in this House, has stated it more than once, and it has formed, I know, one of the links in the arguments which we have from time to time addressed to the House and the country in connection with the relations between this country and the Orange Free State. The general fact was perfectly notorious; but a much more interesting and important question is raised when we come to the estimate, or, as I have already admitted in public, the under-estimate, which the Government made of the military power of the Boers. I do not think, sir, that that under-estimate should be laid to the charge of the Intelligence Department. As regards armaments, I may say that it is impossible now—we have not the information now at our disposal—to correct the estimates made at the beginning of the war. We cannot do it yet. We shall be able to do it no doubt at the end of the war. But at present I really have seen no evidence to show that the Intelligence Department were wrong in any of the facts which it was within their power to authoritatively investigate. By that I mean the number of Boers between the ages of military service, whether in the Orange Free State or in the Transvaal. I believe they had material for forming that estimate, and as far as I know it was correctly formed and was communicated by the military authorities at the War Office to the Government. I am sure my right hon. friend, if he did not communicate it to the House, would have been quite willing to do so if he had been asked. But of course there was a margin which it was impossible for any Intelligence Department exactly to gauge. It has been suggested to me—I do not know on what evidence—that to avoid commandeering for native wars and other things there were some Boers who did not give their names in for the official return. I do not know whether it is true or not. If true there is, of course, an element very difficult to gauge. Another element which it was impossible to gauge was the number of Uitlanders who would take service with the Boers. We do not know now whether that number is large or small; but evidently it could not be accurately estimated by the Intelligence Department, however well equipped; and there is another doubtful element—the number of our own colonists who would, under certain circumstances, throw in their lot with the Boer Republic. Therefore some uncertainty existed, and could not but exist; but I think the Intelligence Department ought to be free from attacks, which, as far as I am able to judge, have no basis in fact. But, it will be asked, how comes it that this great underestimate of the strength of the Boers came to be made, if we knew approximately what the number of the Boer army was and what numbers were likely to take the field? I do not know that I have any very satisfactory answer to give to that question. It is purely and strictly a military problem, and a problem which, as history shows, it is very difficult to answer satisfactorily. You can gauge the military strength of a European nation with a fixed army, with all the modern military apparatus and military statistics at your disposal. You can say how many men Germany could mass in a given time on the French frontier, or how many France could mass on the German frontier, and so on with regard to Austria and Russia, I suppose. But when you come to the problem of States whose military position is not of that elaborate kind, you will find that great mistakes have been made in the past, and I doubt not that great mistakes will be made in the future. They certainly have been made by almost every military nation of which we have any record. But if this is an attack on the military experts at the War Office, it is surely an unfair one. Experts not given generally to agree with one another were absolutely unanimous on this point. I do not think you can quote the opinion of a single soldier, of any position, or no position, delivered, say, before 31st July or 31st August last, indicating that the force sent out to South Africa in the first instance would not be amply sufficient, or more than amply sufficient—["What about Butler?"]—for all purposes. ["Butler! Butler!"] I think that hon. Gentlemen might let me finish the sentence, especially as I have nothing but disappointment in store for them. The right hon. Gentleman put a question about Sir William Butler—a question reiterated with a fervour of expectation by hon. Gentlemen below the gangway, and which unfortunately we are unable to meet. We have not the slightest trace at the War Office of any communication, public or semi-public or private, no communication of any sort, kind or description which indicated in Sir William Butler's opinion that the force we sent out was not sufficient—I was going to say not doubly sufficient—for any work it might be called upon to do. I know not where the opposite view found its origin; but you will not find it in any document in the possession of the War Office.

AN HON. MEMBER: Or the Colonial Office.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Let me say that Sir William Butler does not communicate with the Colonial Office.

AN HON. MEMBER: When he was acting Governor.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hon. Gentlemen may take it from me that I am not trying to play with them or evade the question. I say that in no shape or form, to anybody or through anybody who had access to the Government, or who was a member of the Government, or who had to advise the Government, had we the slightest reason to believe that Sir William Butler's opinion on the military question was what the right hon. Gentleman apparently thinks it is, and what certainly hon. Gentlemen below the gangway think it is. He held the opinion common to every military authority in the country—namely, that the force we had sent to South Africa was in point of number and equipment quite sufficient and more than sufficient to deal with the military difficulties of the case. Sir, one other point I must mention in connection with this controversy about the war. The right hon. Gentleman, who is so easily perturbed at the smallest appearance of misquoting his words, has occupied a great deal of the latter part of his speech in attributing to me a series of opinions which I never held and never expressed. I believe that certain of those opinions were attributed to me in leading articles in certain eminent journals; but I am quite sure that the right hon. Gentleman would not go to that source. If he will take the trouble of reading my speeches—a penalty which I would not willingly inflict on my worst enemy—he will find that I am not guilty of the statement which he has quite unintentionally extracted by some strange and violent process from the words which I actually used.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The "violent process" was a red pencil and a copy of The Times newspaper with the report of the speech.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should have been glad if the right hon. Gentleman had quoted the words. I do not take much interest in speeches myself; but I will give a specimen of the right hon. Gentleman's accuracy of interpretation. He led the House to believe that I had said that with regard to this whole question of the war, and the forces of the Boers, the Government had no more knowledge than the man in the street. I never said anything of the kind. What I did say was that in dealing with the intentions of Boer statesmen, with the intentions of President Kruger, and of those who work with President Kruger, the public were peculiarly well circumstanced by the fact that there was so much communication between this country and the Transvaal; and that we had no special means of information as to their intentions which any well informed man in the street had not equally at his disposal. That seems to me a perfectly true and honest statement, and disposes of our supposed ignorance with regard to armaments and all the rest of it, of which so much has been made. But, Sir, there is a much more important misinterpretation put upon my views by the right hon. Gentleman than any careless utterance which may, perhaps through my fault, lend itself to misinterpretation and misquotation. The right hon. Gentleman has, on the strength of something he supposes that I have said, attributed to the Government the view that they believed in August that war was inevitable; but because they were afraid of Parliamentary difficulties and complications, they deliberately left undefended the colonies they were bound to defend. Sir, I deny that I ever said anything which would lead any fair interpreter to any such conclusion as that. I should think it a disgrace for ever if I belonged to a Government that, for the sake of avoiding a little Parliamentary inconvenience, betrayed the great interests of the Empire. I deny that I ever said anything of the kind. What was the general plan of the Government with regard to this war? We believed, as we have said here and elsewhere, that war was improbable. We also believed that war was possible, and that possibility was a contingency against which it was our business to provide; but we held that there were great diplomatic advantages in not, in August, coming down to the House, and asking for a great Vote in view of the possibilities of immediate hostilities in the Transvaal. We thought that that would have been bad diplomacy—in fact, that it would have been diplomacy doubly bad, because I think we should not have been able to persuade the House that the necessity for the Vote was pressing and urgent. If any hon. Member will honestly put himself back into the frame of mind in which he was on the 10th August last, when this House broke up, he will, I think, agree with that statement. But, Sir, we recognised that we had a duty to perform, and our view was that the improbable contingency of war could be provided against by sending to Cape Colony and Natal a force sufficient to defend the frontiers of those colonies until the large field force we were preparing to send out had arrived and aggressive action was possible. You will say the force sent out was insufficient. Well, it has proved insufficient in the sense that at this moment, we grieve to think, there are portions of both Cape Colony and Natal in the occupation of the enemy, and undoubtedly, therefore, it was insufficient. But let me remind the House that just as our field force was much more than adequate to meet any necessity which military men thought would come upon us, so the defensive force we sent out to Cape Colony and Natal was largely in excess of what we were told was necessary to carry out our policy. Our hope was that the colonies would be fully defended by this force, and we believed, and hoped that before the 25th September a field force, complete in all its parts, transport and everything else, would be accumulated at the Cape, and that the forward movement would go on through the Orange Free State, and would, as we hoped, have the effect of bringing the war to a very distant conclusion. Well, Sir, as the House knows, that plan of campaign was not the one which was carried out. The forces we sent to South Africa have been on the one hand diverted to Natal, and on the other hand diverted to Kimberley, and that forward movement has not yet taken place. No doubt it will do so. Well, Sir, I have been perfectly open with the House. I have told you exactly what we intended to do; and I think it will be admitted by candid critics—if candid critics remain—that the general scheme of operations was not one which in itself was either foolish or reckless, or of a kind likely to sacrifice grave Imperial interests. But the right hon. Gentleman will say: “Your plan of campaign has not been carried out. Has anybody been interfering with the generals either in Natal or elsewhere?” Sir, the generals and the commanding officers we sent to South Africa have not been interfered with at home; they have had absolute discretion as to the military steps they would take to carry out the general intentions of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman pressed me upon the subject of a communication made by the Governor of Natal, at the instance of his own Ministers, and not at our instance, to the commanding officer in that Colony. My right hon. friend the Colonial Secretary is going to lay Papers on the table giving the whole account of that transaction. We had nothing to do with it. We did not prompt it. The communication was made by the Governor at the instance of his Ministers—we do not see how it could be otherwise—but it was not mandatory, and the whole power and responsibility, from the beginning to the end, rested upon the military officer commanding.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN :
With regard to Glencoe and Dundee ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, with regard to everything; with regard to every step, and with regard to the whole plan of campaign. Every move in that plan rested, and has rested, on the generals, and we have not thought it right or desirable to interfere, directly or indirectly, with their responsibility.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN :
I hope the right hon. Gentleman will excuse me for interposing again, but I wish to make sure. My object is to inform and satisfy the public mind, which has been greatly exercised upon this point. I asked the right hon. Gentleman three questions. I asked him with regard to Glencoe and Dundee. That was one point. I asked him with regard to Ladysmith itself. The third point was with regard to the transference of a considerable force from a central point in South Africa to Natal. I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that in all these three cases it was purely the discretion of the military authorities that determined the issue?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, the right hon. Gentleman has perfectly correctly interpreted my words. I think I have now finished with the right hon. Gentleman's attack on our military policy. But I noticed an expected omission. I noticed the right hon. Gentleman said nothing about the adequacy of our armaments and the excellence of our guns to carry out the work of the Army. I think the omission was intelligible, because the right hon. Gentleman himself with great tact, but with no very reforming spirit, was responsible for Army matters for two, three, or four years—I will not say eventful years, because they were eminently uneventful so far as the War Office was concerned, for none of the great increases in our forces, none of the great improvements in the accommodation for our men, none of the increases in our armaments, none of the improvements in our Army, can be dated from the right hon. Gentleman's tenure of office. If hon. Gentlemen will look back on the many debates which occurred on this topic, if they will look back over the history of the War Office for any period of years they like, so long as they go back before 1895, to make a comparison with sacred '95—which was the beginning of the date of wisdom—they will find that all increases in efficiency, in numbers, all improvements in organisation, have emanated from this side of the House without exception; and it is within the last three years that the greatest improvements have been made as regards barrack accommodation, the number of our troops, and in artillery and guns. I therefore think the right hon. Gentleman was well advised in not carrying on his criticism of the Government into our military policy, so far as to call in question the action of the War Office in connection with our forces. The right hon. Gentleman asked us whether we held that criticism at this stage of our proceedings was out of place. No, Sir, I think the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly right in criticising us. I could have wished that the criticism were based on a more accurate study of documents, and were fairer in spirit, but to criticism itself I make no objection whatever. But I understand the right hon. Gentleman and his friends are going further in criticism to-night. I understand they propose doing their best to take upon their own shoulders and their superior intelligence and knowledge of affairs the further conduct of the affairs of this Empire in general and of the war in particular. The noble Lord the Member for the Cricklade Division, who, I presume, will follow me, has got this task in hand. I can assure him I wish him well through it. He has on his side some advantages, for he speaks to the House, and through the House to the country, which is justly disappointed with the result of the war up to the present date, and which feels, and must feel acutely, how its hopes, its natural hopes—I was going to say its legitimate hopes—have been disappointed. That is a good audience to appeal to when you are attacking those in power; and I am sure the noble Lord is not less endowed with that wisdom so plentifully distributed amongst the sons of men, but which is not more precious than rubies—I mean wisdom after the event. But while the noble Lord has some advantages in preaching from that text, surely he has some disadvantages. The whole object of the Amendment, rumour assures me, the speech of the leader of the Opposition assures me, is to urge the complaint made against us as to our want of foresight—that foresight with which hon. Gentlemen opposed to us, who wish to take our places, consider themselves liberally endowed. There are many kinds of foresight. The foresight with which men are endowed is not always of the same kind. For instance there is the foresight of the hon. Baronet the Member for the Berwick Division. The foresight of the hon. Baronet tells him that we ought to have made greater preparations at an earlier date, but the foresight of the right hon. Gentleman himself tells him that the mistake we made was in making any preparations at all, and the quality of foresight of the right hon. Gentleman is shared by another eminent Member on that bench, who wrote an article in one of the reviews, in which he quoted with approval the famous sentence of the right hon. Gentleman:—"Not only was war not necessary, but warlike preparations were not necessary."

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN :
I said so to-night.

Mr. A. J. Balfour.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am pointing out, not that the foresight of the Opposition is bad, but that there are so many kinds of foresight. In the right hon. gentleman's indictment the whole scope of the negotiations since 1895 down to the outbreak of war is included. Very good. But the foresight of one-half of the Opposition leads them to believe after that survey that the war is an unjust one and a war that could have been avoided. The foresight of not less distinguished members of the same Opposition leads them to exactly the opposite conclusion—namely, that the war is a just war and could not have been avoided. I suppose in defence of the Opposition foresight hon. Gentleman from Ireland will go into the lobby in support of the vote of censure. They think to a man that the war was unjust in its inception, and ought to be put an end to as quickly as possible. That is their foresight. The right hon. Gentleman apparently thinks, though probably he will be very angry with me for saying so, that the war ought to be put an end to immediately we have driven, or soon after we have driven, the enemy from our own territory. But, on the other hand, there are Members sitting near him, and colleagues of his own in the other House, whose foresight is of an altogether different kind, and they agree with us in being absolutely determined that this war shall be driven to a successful issue, and that by a successful issue is not meant any suzerainty, any shadowy supremacy in South Africa, but the real, substantial supremacy of Great Britain over all these regions. There are two kinds of foresight upon that important subject; and to make the whole thing as absurd as it can be—who is going to be the Gentleman to put into one fold these sheep and these goats? Who is it who is going to do his best to put the Government into a minority, and to transfer the future administration of the country to Gentlemen on the other side? A very distinguished Member of this House only a few days ago told the country that the last thing that was desirable in the present crisis was a change of Government.

MR. GLADSTONE (Leeds, W.): I said it was the last thing we should wish.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I thought you would probably wish what was desirable.

But while the Opposition have in their discretion taken this course, they have announced—though none of their sections agree as to the justice of this war or as to the mode in which it should be pursued—that they mean to do their best to turn us out. Sir, they are quite at liberty to take that course. All I ask for is this, that if, on their part, they find that this Government has the confidence of the House, that confidence will not in future during this great national crisis be disturbed by unnecessary or petty criticism or unnecessary or petty questioning. I, on my part, engage that if the right hon. Gentleman succeeds, and if the country endorses his action, I, if still a member of this House, will do my best to support the Ministry of the day in any steps they may take to pursue the war to the conclusion I have already described. I refrain from alluding further to the noble Lord's Amendment, on which I shall probably have to speak once again before these debates come to an end. Let me conclude by saying that the Government do not minimise the magnitude of the task which is before us, and we have no desire to conceal what shortcomings may be detected in the past. We are anxious to learn every lesson which that past can teach. We know that the future is, and must be for some time, full of anxiety and full of difficulty for those who are responsible for the management of public affairs. That responsibility, great as it is, we shall endeavour to fulfil as long as we have the confidence of this House. And, as we shall never advise peace until the war has brought forth its legitimate fruits, so we believe that, in spite of any ambiguity of utterance from any quarter of the other side of the House, the country will insist that the Ministers who serve it, be they drawn from one side of the House or from the other, will see not only that the military honour of this country is amply vindicated, but that we leave in South Africa no root from which again may spring forth any of the bitter and poisonous fruits from which for so many years we have been suffering.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE (Wilts, Cricklade): Sir, there have been many sessions within the knowledge and recollection of Members here to-night when the speeches upon the Address in reply to Her Majesty's most gracious

Speech have been of a formal character, and I hope Members opposite will believe that I speak from the bottom of my heart when I express the wish that the proceedings on the present occasion could have partaken of that nature. It is no pleasure to rise to impugn the policy of the Government in regard to foreign affairs. My own past conduct in this House enables me to say that I have never offered a factious opposition to any Government with regard to foreign affairs. Last year I gained some ill-will from hon. Gentlemen on my own side of the House because I considered it my duty to support Her Majesty's Government in the lobby upon the critical questions which had for the time overclouded our relations with France. I had previously considered it to be my duty at public meetings in my own constituency and elsewhere, at the risk of offending those with whom I generally agree, to record the opinion that in the controversy with France, the country with which of all others we ought to be on good terms, right and justice lay with Her Majesty's Government. If I thought for one moment that such was the position of affairs to-day, I would not hesitate again to do what I should consider to be my duty, even at the risk of again separating myself from hon. Members of my own party, in supporting the Government. I honestly regret that that is not the case. I am glad, however, that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House, although he has severely condemned by anticipation the Amendment I am going to move, has not contended that we on this side of the House have no right to move such an Amendment. I have been astonished to read the criticisms which, in certain influential newspapers, have been levelled against the Opposition. Not only is it common sense, but all historical precedent and every constitutional doctrine points to this, that the first and legitimate duty of the Opposition, whether in regard to foreign or home affairs, is to indulge in criticism of the proper kind and at the right moment. On the other hand it is not their right to go one inch outside their proper position, and allow that criticism to degenerate into faction, and I earnestly trust that not one word of mine to-night will appear so to degenerate. If we were not to indulge in criticism upon occasions of this kind we should perhaps be obliged to have recourse to some such course as that adopted by Mr. Fox and his followers, when they thought fit to abandon their duty in Parliament, and he retired to St. Ann's Hill. But the verdict of the historian and the biographer has been adverse to the course they then adopted, and has endorsed the action of Mr. Tierney, who at the head of a small and diminished section, remained here, and attended this House. It has been said that I have against me the great precedent of the conduct of the elder Pitt, but I am afraid that those who say that if we follow the example of the elder Pitt we should abandon opposition and criticism in this House must be very insufficiently acquainted with that statesman's character, conduct, and career. The elder Pitt was not only a successful war minister, but a leader of opposition, and nobody denies that one of the greatest chapters in his life is his persistent opposition (when Lord Chatham) against what he considered to be the unwise and impolitic war with our American colonies. I think above all of that famous speech in which he spoke of the "spring hopes and verdant promises" of Her Majesty's Government, and I cannot help fearing that in regard to some passages of our South African affairs we have been till recently in danger of realising the force of that sarcastic description in which Lord Chatham warned the House of Lords in 1776 against listening to "spring hopes and verdant promises" in regard to military affairs. That was the moment when a large British army was in America in a difficult and isolated position, and was described by the elder Pitt as being too many to make peace and too few to make war. It is not my wish to turn this debate into a criticism of War Office details, or to impugn the position of any particular person or office. I venture to remind the House that attacks on particular Ministers and particular departments have not proceeded from this side of the House, nor have they been made at public meetings addressed by members of the party to which I belong. All those criticisms have emanated from the Ministerial side of the House and from newspapers representing Ministerial views. I altogether repudiate them. About six weeks ago the grim silence of a London Sunday morning was enlivened by an article in a Ministerial journal which said that the country was in danger, and that the only way to save it was to call for the immediate resignation of the Lord Privy Seal and the President of the Local Government Board. I have very great respect for the President of the Local Government Board, but I have yet to learn that Pretoria is subject to the Orders of the Local Government Board, while, as to the Lord Privy Seal, some years ago I attempted to ascertain what his duties were, but I do not recollect that it was ever said that he had any special responsibility for South Africa or that South Africa was under his particular control. The House must recollect that the Daily Mail is not the organ of the Front Opposition Bench, nor are we very influential with regard to the policy of the Spectator newspaper, but those are the quarters from which the attacks upon particular departments have emanated. In their columns it is stated that the only thing which can save the country is the immediate expulsion of the Secretary of State for War, and the substitution for him of the hon. Member for West Belfast. According to the Spectator the hon. Member should go to Pall Mall, clad, I suppose, in complete armour like the ghost of Hamlet's father, and immediately do some great or striking action which will deliver this unfortunate country and so alarm President Kruger that he will at once sue for peace upon bended knees. I will only mention one other of these ridiculous proposals, which, remember, emanate from organs representing the Ministerial side of the House. I am told that in a Yorkshire newspaper the weakness of the Government has been stated to consist in the fact that the Member for the Ecclesall Division of Sheffield is not a member of the Government, and that he ought to be at once called in to advise Her Majesty's Ministers. Unfortunately, he is not here at present; he has gone to the seat of war, as he went to Greece and Turkey two years ago. He was then taken prisoner by the Greeks at sea, and is now probably undergoing a second period of captivity. I am sure when he returns we shall listen to him with great interest. But, Sir, I do not believe that the presence or absence of any of the hon. Members to whom reference has been made is at all the question before the House. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that during the last five years very great alterations and improvements have been made at the War Office. But it is also perfectly possible at the same time to believe that the preparations made necessary by this sudden war in South Africa cast a burden upon the War Office which it was not ready to undertake, and therefore the blame is not upon the War Office or any departmental Minister who represents the military or the civil side of the War Office, but it is upon the Cabinet and upon the Government. Being a civilian, I would hesitate to offer even the most modest opinion of my own upon any military question whatever, but I have been very much struck by the opinion of a writer of great knowledge and authority, whose name I believe is known, but which I am not at liberty to mention—the writer of a very able article in the January number of the Edinburgh Review, in which the whole of this military question is discussed with great knowledge and admirable impartiality. The writer points out that the responsibility for this war, and therefore for the preparations necessitated by the war, is not a matter which you can trace to the War Office as a separate department of the State, and that therefore it is not possible to make any particular Minister responsible, excepting in so far as he is a member of the Cabinet, and jointly responsible with his colleagues for whatever mistakes have been made. The war, he says, is not due to the War Office. Their business has solely been to organise the strength of the nation with the means placed at their disposal and to render to the Government an account of the British readiness to take the field. It has been the duty of successive Governments and Parliaments to decide upon the scale of our armaments on land and on sea, and the duty of the Military and Naval Departments is to give the very best army and navy procurable under those conditions in order to carry out the general objects which those Governments and Cabinets have had in view. That is a true and legitimate description of the constitutional relations of the War Office and the Government. My case against the Government is not a departmental case against the War Office, but it is, following the words of the writer in the Edinburgh Review, that the general objects which you suddenly thrust upon the War Office by embarking them in a great war in South Africa, were objects for which your War Office was not organised, is not organised, and never has been organised, and for which you had not voted estimates. We all value our civil rights and political liberties, and it is an alarming thing to see the light way in which plans are being now put forward to introduce military conscription into this country, and in which we are called as a matter of course, almost without discussion, to vote enormous sums in order to send 120,000 men to South Africa. Your War Office and existing military organisation was never intended for such a purpose. The policy of this country was never fixed upon lines meant to make this country a great military Power. I want to know under what conception, not only of military policy, but also of law and government, is it that friends and supporters of the Government come forward with a light heart and say that at every cost, never mind what, never mind the number of men who may be swallowed up in South Africa, we are to be ready in future to hurl masses of men across the ocean regardless of the consequences to our own institutions and liberties which entering upon a gigantic policy of this kind must entail. An army or a navy is a sufficient and efficient force, not in the abstract, but according to the burdens which the Government of the time calls upon it to bear; and my case against the Government is that the burden which they have placed upon the War Office is one which no War Office could possibly have supported without greater notice and fuller time than that which was allowed. In the article already referred to the author, speaking evidently with an inside knowledge of affairs, says that, in his opinion, the War Office has placed the defences of the United Kingdom upon a sound basis, and that about a year ago that work was well forward and was fast approaching completion. But the very fact that so much energy and skill had been put into it had fully occupied the time of the officials of the War Office, and prevented them giving the time which they intended to Imperial defence, which they desired to take up at the proper time. Those facts must have been within the knowledge of the Government, and yet, notwithstanding this, the War Office is suddenly called upon by what I venture to call an irritating and reckless policy, to perform duties for the performance of which you have not given them the proper means, and in regard to which you have not allowed adequate time for preparation. I must protest, at the same time, against what fell from the right hon. Gentleman when he said that nothing had been done for the defences of this country by previous Administrations. It is almost impossible to separate naval and military administration. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to tell this House that he thinks Lord Spencer did nothing for the administration of the Navy? The two things largely hang together, and I venture, in the first place, to ask him that question. I venture to deny the statement that nothing was done for military reform during the Administration of Mr. Gladstone and Lord Rosebery. I would remind him that on the very day when this Government came into power a great personal change took place which undoubtedly enabled a new era of military affairs to be opened. It is beyond dispute that the Duke of Wellington was the greatest soldier of his day, and yet when he died everybody felt that military reforms which had before been looked upon as impossible afterwards became more possible than they otherwise would have become. I apply that analogy now, and I venture to say that although no man was more devoted to his profession, or threw himself with greater zeal into the discharge of his duties than the Duke of Cambridge, nevertheless, when the change in the command in chief took place at the time the present Government came into power, and the Duke of Cambridge gave way to Lord Wolseley, certain reforms became more easy. I say this notwithstanding all my admiration for the services and great career of the Duke of Cambridge. It was ungenerous for the right hon. Gentleman to stand up in this House and say that nothing whatever had been done for military reform by the Government of Lord Rosebery when we recollect that there were certain advantages entirely unconnected with the personality of Her Majesty's present Ministers which undoubtedly facilitated the reforms which all Governments desired to carry out. The Government have thrown on the back of an already overburdened War Office the gigantic task of transporting a large army across the sea. I think I may say, so far as the War Office is concerned, that the transport of these men has been well carried out, and if anybody had told us a few years ago that it would be possible at such very short notice to send, not across the Channel, but to the uttermost ends of the earth, across the ocean, a large and, on the whole, a well equipped army, even allowing for some inevitable failures in small details, it would have been said that was a matter of which we might well be proud. But it is perfectly possible to hold, as I do, this view, and to hold the view at the same time that the War Office ought never to have been called upon to perform this duty owing to the circumstances which I have explained. The War Office were engaged upon reforms which would have enabled them, when completed, a few years hence, to have performed their duties in an effectual manner, because then the whole question of the military defences of the Empire would have been taken into consideration. Who can doubt when the Bill mentioned in Her Majesty's gracious Speech for the federation of the Australian colonies is carried through it will be a measure which will very greatly facilitate the solution of the problem of Imperial defence, and will enable them to co-operate with us in a manner which they cannot do now. That is one reason why the War Office should not have been called upon to send this army across the sea now. It is further the undoubted fact—and nothing that fell from the right hon. Gentleman enables me, much as I should wish, to alter the opinion that everybody has formed, even his own followers and supporters, from the perusal of his speeches—that the belief of the Government was that the Transvaal would never, of its own accord, declare war against England. That is not a question of War Office administration, but a question of the belief of the Government. They believed that the Orange Free State, which had shown very great independence of the Transvaal in many ways in regard to commercial matters, never was likely to turn round and enter into an alliance, offensive as well as defensive, with the Transvaal Government. They believed that under no circumstances would the Transvaal or the Free State armies invade British territory, and they did not believe that the forces of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State combined represented anything like the number of men who are now gathered under their standards. The right hon. Gentleman has answered, no doubt, many of the queries of my right hon. friend in regard to Sir William Butler's despatches, and the answers he has given us, as far as I am able to form an opinion, are of a satisfactory kind. But as I have already pointed out neither my right hon. friend nor myself base our case upon the existence or non-existence of some particular despatch or paper in the War Office or the Colonial Office. We base our case upon far larger grounds. We do not impugn any particular minister. If we are to impugn anybody it would be that extraordinary body the Committee of National Defence. What is this Committee of National Defence, and what are its duties? Of whom does it really consist? Where does it meet? When the Government was formed, I recollect there was a great flourish of trumpets about the Committee of National Defence. I was always of opinion that the true Committee of National Defence consisted of the First Lord of the Admiralty and the Secretary of State for War, and what I want to know is what is the advantage of calling into council men who, as far as I can make out, are none of them military men, but are certain civilian members of the Cabinet, presided over by the Lord President. The very name of the Committee of National Defence has to me an ominous ring. We have all heard of the Government of National Defence in France, which only lives in history because it failed to drive out the invader and to prevent the capitulation of Paris. My right hon. friend has happily compared the Committee of National Defence to the Aulic Council of Vienna, which historians have said is responsible for all the great military disasters which have befallen the Austrian Empire. I cannot help noticing in this connection another unfortunate circumstance which originated with the present Government, and that is that the great office of Prime Minister has been associated with that of the Minister for Foreign Affairs. I am quite willing to acknowledge that if I was to look at this matter from the point of view of the inside of the Foreign Office, I might see some advantages in it, because the combination saves time in the passing backwards and forwards of despatches before final signature. But that is only a small part of the question. The office of the Prime Minister, so far as it is capable of definition, is to control the general policy of the Cabinet. Now if ever there was a case where the general control of the Prime Minister was desirable, and where unfortunately it was found wanting, that was the case of our negotiations with the South African Republic. I can hardly imagine that any minister having to deal with South African affairs would not have desired to obtain what might be called a good second opinion upon nearly every important step of the negotiations. Without wishing to suggest anything disrespectful of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies, I would remind the House that Lord Russell, who had been Foreign Minister, stated in his place in the House of Lords in 1871 that he had himself—more particularly on two famous occasions—found an enormous advantage through not being Prime Minister as well as Foreign Secretary, because he was able to submit his despatches for criticism to the superior knowledge and judgment of Lord Palmerston. If a man who had himself been Prime Minister, like Lord Russell, was able, in his old age, publicly and willingly to make an admission of that kind, you may be perfectly certain that when great negotiations of this kind are going on, that what is true of the Foreign Minister is equally true of the Colonial Minister, and it would have been a great advantage if the despatches of the Colonial Secretary, so many of them unfortunate in their tone and irritating in their manner, had been first submitted to the ripper wisdom of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who, we all admit, is a statesman of the greatest experience, and who has, on the whole, been singularly successful as Foreign Minister. In regard to the military aspect of this expedition, the real indictment against the Government is that they have plunged into it like the administration of Lord Aberdeen plunged into the Crimean war. The main fact of the present situation is that which my right hon. friend put forward at the commencement of his remarks—the main, broad, and terrible fact that we are at war. As he very truly said, that fact by itself may be said to shift the burden of proof from me, or anybody else on this side of the House, on to the Government, to show why war has become necessary. Lord Clarendon, one of the greatest Foreign Ministers we ever had, passed, perhaps, unintentionally, the severest condemnation on the Crimean War, by acknowledging that we had drifted into it. I believe the honour of that phrase has been divided between him and Lord Aberdeen, the Prime Minister at the time, but in any case it was used; and I think it very accurately describes the circumstances under which this country has been involved in this most unfortunate war. I hope I shall not be charged with this imputation of faction, by again quoting the First Lord of the Treasury, in the first of the series of speeches he delivered in East Manchester—so often alluded to, and to be alluded to again. He used language about the Opposition which, I confess, I read with regret. He said that the Opposition “merely exist—politically exist—to take some argumentative or controversial advantage of the Government which happens to be in power.” Such language coming from the First Lord of the Treasury was very unfortunate. Some day or another, under the stress of party warfare, the right hon. Gentleman may again find himself on this side of the House, and I hope that the Government of that day may not be exposed, as a matter of course, to an Opposition of that kind. I can recollect myself, when I held office with my right hon. friend beside me, some forms of opposition which might come within the description of the First Lord of the Treasury, and I would suggest to him that he should not indulge in language which might revive recollections we are all quite willing to forget, and prefer if we can to involve in an atmosphere of philosophic doubt. The broad question is, and we have a right to ask it, How is it that we are at war? I venture to say that we cannot answer that question satisfactorily without examining the history of those negotiations which preceded the war. I assure the House that it is not my intention to weary it by going over in any detail the ground that was trod in our long debates in October last. But if I wanted to do so I might find a justification for it, and for a great deal more, on account of what fell from the First Lord of the Treasury. He attempted to pour ridicule upon the fact that the history of these negotiations, as touched upon in this Amendment, only began in 1895. Well, does he want to go still further back? If I were to do so I would have to prolong my observations to a greater extent than I desire to trespass on the attention of the House. But if I were to accept the invitation of the right hon. Gentleman to extend my inquiries behind the year 1895, I should only strengthen my own case. Because my case is this—and I desire to put it in perfectly clear and unambiguous language—that Her Majesty's Government have been all along far too ready to forget the events before 1895, and to forget that although in comparatively recent years we have had considerable grievances against the Transvaal Republic, there are behind these years, memories of facts and transactions which have sown, and not unnaturally sown, in the breast of the Boers of the Transvaal feelings of suspicion, and in some cases of hatred, which it is the duty of every Colonial Minister to bear in mind if he desires to have a reputation for wise and prudent statesmanship. My regret is that the papers presented to us, and discussed in October, showed that the Colonial Minister had not taken these feelings into consideration, and had pursued an irritating course of diplomacy, very largely on his own responsibility, and without that wise control which the Prime Minister might have given to it if he had not been also Foreign Secretary. The Colonial Secretary thus embittered the relations between this country and the South African Republics. The proposals of the Colonial Secretary were in themselves not open to objection, but when they considered the manner in which they were made, they became the object of suspicion, because they were associated in the minds of the Boers of the Transvaal Republic with events and embittered memories of their youth. I do not want to go beyond 1895. The last days of that year and the earliest days of 1896 marked a point of departure. The events happened which are associated with the raid and its immediate results and consequences. Now, the raid was not the work of one or two entirely independent people, as was at first thought. It was part of a conspiracy, long and deeply planned by the Prime Minister of Cape Colony; and when that fact, first denied and long artfully concealed, came out, can it be wondered at that people naturally prone to suspicion were plunged into an atmosphere of still deeper suspicion—an atmosphere which in any case it would have been difficult to remove. But that difficulty was made an impossibility, not only by the course of the diplomacy of the right hon. the Colonial Secretary, but by various events in this country which I do not hesitate to allude to in this debate. This country is not merely judged abroad by the language, courteous or discourteous, of its representatives abroad or at home. There is a large world even more important than any world of officialdom; and I venture to say that the worst thing about the Raid was that, not only was the punishment meted out by the courts of law, so far as the offenders came within reach of English justice, certainly not excessive—and I do not advocate excessive punishment—but that much of it was remitted at a very early date, so far as one can judge, after a course of agitation in this country which made the heroes of this raid—which, had it been on sea, would have been called an act of piracy—for the moment some of the most popular people in this country, so far as outward manifestations could point. The leaders were the darlings of London drawing-rooms, and the privates were the cheap heroes of every music-hall. Do you think these facts were not known abroad, and in the Transvaal? Can you wonder, then, that these suspicious people in the Transvaal, seeing people of great social position and influence taking so incorrect a view, believed that, although the War Office had properly punished these men, and did its duty in the matter, there was an opinion in England stronger than the War Office; stronger than the Courts of Justice—the opinion of the “man in the street,” if I may use that current expression, which would force the hands of justice in this country, and would eventually enable a larger, and stronger, and if possible more successful raid to be made against the Transvaal. Now, what was the conduct of the Government, as represented by the Colonial Office? In the first place it was most injudicious. If you turn to the Blue Book you will find that hardly had the embers of the raid died down than the Colonial Minister began telegraphing to Sir Hercules Robinson—whose death and disappearance from office and responsibility this country cannot too much deplore—regarding the desirability of beginning negotiations about the grievances which existed in the Transvaal. Sir Hercules Robinson, a man of the soundest judgment in South African affairs, both telegraphed and wrote back to say that nothing, in his opinion, would be more unwise than to commence these negotiations, and to appear at that moment, almost red handed from the raid, to be cramming reforms down the throats of the Transvaal Republic. But the Colonial Secretary was not to be denied, and telegraphed positive instructions to Sir H. Robinson to proceed with these negotiations. These despatches were the beginning of the long and unfortunate negotiations, the end of which is that we are involved in war in South Africa. I wish that I could terminate my observations on that chapter of history here, but I shall not hesitate to say in this House—where, after all, freedom of speech has existed for centuries, and where no power in the press, or anywhere else, is great enough to put it down—that in my opinion the punishment, or rather the escape from punishment and blame of the prime organiser of the raid, was one of the most fatal things that ever happened. It is time that this should be said from these benches. Sir, I have said, and I do not retire by one jot from the statement, that if the raid had been an expedition at sea, it would have been an act of common piracy, and the man who stays at home and organises an act of piracy is an accessory before the fact, and is as criminal as the men who carry it out. The prime organiser was Mr. Cecil Rhodes, and he is still on the roll of Her Majesty's Privy Council. It was universally believed that one of the first acts of the Government would have been to have struck off Mr. Rhodes from the roll of that Council. Suppose this raid had been organised against some powerful Continental State like France or Germany, do you imagine for a single moment that we would have kept the prime mover in it on the roll of the Privy Council, the roll of everything most honourable and distinguished in this country? But because the offence was against a small and weak State, miles away in the interior of Africa, we folded our hands and nothing was done. Then came the years 1897-98, when we had the inquiry into the raid at the Cape—a very valuable and useful inquiry—followed by the inquiry here. I was not then a Member of this House, and am not conversant with some of the details, but I venture to say that nobody who is a student of constitutional history or a lover of that great heritage of political privilege and right which belongs to the House of Commons can doubt that the manner in which that inquiry ended struck a very heavy blow at the right of the House to what is justly regarded as important a privilege as any it possesses—the privilege of inquiry—quite as important as our legislative privilege or the general control exercised over administration. I recollect perfectly well that at the time of the Crimean war, when Lord John Russell was Leader of this House and Lord Aberdeen was Prime Minister, he wrote a letter which is contained in his Life by Mr. Spencer Walpole. He there placed on record, as against some of the objections of his colleagues, that he considered this right of inquiry on the part of the House of Commons to be one of its most precious privileges. There was no higher constitutional authority than Lord Russell, and his name will always be mentioned on this side of the House, and I believe on the other side also, with great honour. As I have said the inquiry ended, but like a river which is lost in the sands. Can you doubt that when the Government of the Transvaal found that the main result of the inquiry so far as they were concerned was that the Colonial Minister rose and explained in this House that in spite of what was contained in the report of the Committee, in his opinion, the late Prime Minister of Cape Colony was an entirely honourable person, and that he had done nothing that clashed with the rules of honour—can you doubt that in the Transvaal that declaration produced a most unfavourable effect? That being so, was it not the bounden duty of the Colonial Secretary, in the course of his negotiations, to avoid every cause of offence he possibly could? But what happened? The Colonial Secretary published and presented to Parliament an irritating despatch by Sir Alfred Milner—a most brilliant piece of writing, I admit, but a despatch of a most unusual kind, considered as a public document. It was a fresh cause of suspicion. Then the Colonial Secretary went down to

Lord E. Fitzmaurice.

Lord E. Fitzmaurice.

Highbury and made the famous speech so often alluded to in the debates of last October. But not only was that speech made; but the Prime Minister selected that time, the 28th July, to make a speech in another place, which, if it had been made in relation to any foreign Power in Europe would have been an adequate reason for the Ambassador of that Power to immediately ask for his passports. These grave and important facts are the reasons why we say that this war in which we are engaged could have been avoided. We are not here, as we are sometimes told in language most unfair, to appear as apologists of President Kruger, and to say that he has been always right and Her Majesty's Government always wrong. On the contrary, we have always said that President Kruger was an obstinate and unreasonable old man, who is animated by a bitter hatred of this country. Our whole case is that that being so it was the duty of the Colonial Secretary to do everything he could to avoid bringing matters to a crisis. And for this reason. It may sound an ungracious thing to calculate on the age of President Kruger. But one must look at all the facts. We know that he is 76 years of age; and we know that at the last election General Joubert nearly beat him for the Presidency. Did not common sense dictate that every conceivable effort should be made to stave off anything like a crisis until this obstinate and unreasonable old man had been removed to the House of Lords or elsewhere? Sir, exactly the opposite course was pursued, and the result was that a condition of things where war was possible and where I might even admit war was under certain circumstances probable, was converted into a state of things where war became practically a certainty. But at this point we are met by a new departure. Up to the end of October the Government was content to rest its case upon the fact that it had pursued the negotiations in a regular and orthodox way, and that owing to the circumstances of the moment—laid within a tolerably limited compass—war had unfortunately resulted. But since October—although I admit there is one indication of it in Sir Alfred Milner's despatch of the 5th May—a perfectly new explanation of the policy and conduct of the Government, and a new apology for the war, has suddenly been launched on the country. We are told that the war could not have been avoided, and was absolutely inevitable, because of the gigantic preparations of the Transvaal for many years, and also because of a huge conspiracy not merely to maintain the independence of the Orange Free State and the Transvaal, but actually to drive the English out of Cape Colony and out of Natal. I can only say that if the Government were in possession last October of information which really convinced them of the truth of these allegations, they ought to have put it fully before the House; they ought to have taken the House into their confidence: they ought to have seen that the military preparations that they could make were, owing to the circumstances I pointed out in the earlier part of my speech, altogether beyond what was possible, notwithstanding the good organisation of the War Office—for the ordinary purposes of war; they ought, in that case, to have redoubled their energies to have avoided saying one single word which was likely to precipitate a conflict, because they knew that it would not be only a promenade across the Drakensberg, and so on to Pretoria, but that they were in danger of a movement of the Afrikaner population in the whole of South Africa against us. As a matter of fact, these ideas were an afterthought, and even at this moment, although the First Lord of the Treasury has put them forward in public speeches at Manchester and elsewhere, and other members of the Government have followed suit—I venture to say that I am not satisfied, and that Members on this side of the House are not satisfied that there is anywhere any evidence of gigantic military preparations in the Transvaal before the raid. I have the evidence of the Blue Book to show that Sir Hercules Robinson wrote after the raid, and pointed out to the Colonial Secretary that the preparations of the Boers were, no doubt, very great, but that they were defensive preparations, and that they were the result of the suspicions caused by the raid. That is not my opinion, but that of the High Commissioner, Sir Hercules Robinson, afterwards Lord Rosmead. The opinion of a man like Sir Hercules Robinson—Lord Rosmead—who had lived the best part of his life in South Africa, and who knew the ropes as no other man did, was of infinitely greater importance than that of Sir Alfred Milner. Then there is the great Afrikaner conspiracy, of which I have great difficulty in speaking patiently. I do not believe in it. Where is the evidence of it? If you have any evidence give it to us, as it is to your interest to do so. The great Afrikaner conspiracy is chiefly supported by the wild allegations of some society of which Mr. Cecil Rhodes is or was the president, and I think I am right in saying that in the course of the debate in October last it was stated by the Colonial Secretary that it would be unsafe to attach too great a reliance on their evidence. I cannot find where the evidence of this gigantic conspiracy is. I should have thought persons, and documents, and facts would be produced, but there is nothing of the kind. There is nothing in the world which drives the intellect into such unreasonable errors as the idea of a conspiracy. It is something upon which you cannot put your hand; everybody knows it, or says he does; it is here, there, and everywhere; at the door; under the table; somebody has seen it, or if he has not seen it himself he knows of somebody who has; until in the end many believe that they have actually seen and heard things who would have to acknowledge, if pressed, that they had never seen or heard anything of the kind. We have seen how last year a neighbouring and friendly nation, which ought to have been superior to any such ideas, was driven almost mad by the idea of a great Jewish conspiracy. It was said that a large body of people in this country were in sympathy and alliance with it, and we know how absurd that was. But people in France believed it. We know from our own history how such a belief lays hold of people. Our own records show how in the reign of Charles II. wild imagination ascribed whatever murder was committed and whatever crime took place to a supposed popish plot, and large numbers of persons of all ranks of life were sent to the scaffold in consequence. I say the Government of the day ought to have been most careful before it based its policy on the belief of a great Afrikaner conspiracy. How can you believe in the report of this great conspiracy in the face of the loyalty of the Dutch colonists in South Africa some years ago at the time of the Jubilee and the Colonial conference for federation and defence?

The Government are under the obligation now to make up their minds and say which of the two horses they intend to ride. Was the war inevitable or not? I do not believe that even the First Lord of the Treasury could make out that the two arguments work together. There are many aspects of this unfortunate war, and I wish that even when I have traced the origins as I have that I could leave it there. But I must say that the Government in my opinion have not acted wisely since the war began, or rather since it became certain it must take place. I am not going to indulge in military criticism, because, as I have said, I am not a military authority; but there was a time when I represented the Foreign Office in this House, and I may therefore perhaps be entitled to say a word on this aspect of the question. It appears to me that there has been a most lamentable fiasco in connection with the search and seizure of German ships, and I am anxious to have an opportunity of saying—and I think the hon. Gentleman representing the Foreign Office will support me—that no greater courtesy in diplomacy, no better example of the comity of nations could be found than the speech of Count von Bülow on the subject. It is necessary that something should be said in this House in view of the attacks that have been made by the newspapers on the language of Count von Bülow. It must be remembered that he was speaking to the German Parliament, to the German people, and when you bear in mind the position of extreme difficulty in which the Foreign Minister of Germany was in having to say nothing that would affront the Foreign Office of this country and still to satisfy the German people, the speech he made was one that redounds highly to his honour. There is another matter bearing on the relation of the Foreign Office to this question which seems to me to be open to criticism. There is one thing which I think the Foreign Office might have done to help the operations of war, and that was with regard to the issue of the proclamation to British subjects as to trading with the enemy. That was not issued as soon as it might have been. When, in 1861, there was a danger of a war with the United States, Lord Palmerston, took time by the forelock. I have a letter in my hand written by Lord Palmerston to

Lord E. Fitzmaurice.

Lord Granville, on the 29th November, 1861, in which he said—

"Would it not be possible to have a Council to-morrow afternoon, if the Cabinet should on full consideration agree to a proclamation forbidding the export of arms, gunpowder, and saltpetre? I shall try to persuade them, for it is plain that war with the Northern Americans is possible, and if that is so, would it not be an act of folly, amounting to absolute imbecility, to let those who soon may be our enemies, and whom we believe intending to be so, go on extracting from our own warehouses and workshops the means of war against us? The right thing would be to prohibit the export altogether. Some of our merchants and manufacturers might suffer and complain; but the interest of the few must yield to the welfare of the many."

They did not wait till the war had begun. If the proclamation had been issued it would have prevented large consignments of arms and munitions of war to the Transvaal which went from Birmingham and elsewhere shortly before war was declared. I am only speaking of facts.

AN HON. MEMBER: What facts?

LORD E. FITZMAURICE: I am saying that ammunition and stores found their way over to the Transvaal not merely from Germany and France but England as well. I am speaking of before the war, otherwise Lord Palmerston's letter would not be relevant. What I am accusing the Foreign Office of is negligence in not preventing before the war began the importation of arms into the Transvaal from this country. Of course if I am wrong in my dates and the right hon. Gentleman can show me that this proclamation was issued earlier, then my accusation falls to the ground, but if I am right in my dates there has been a lamentable waste of time. Only one other word: the right hon. Gentleman challenges us as to our views about this war. He tried, as he has done all along, to fasten upon us the imputation of want of patriotism, because we do not go the length of the Ministerial journals in saying that we shall never be satisfied, and will offer no terms whatever, until we have stamped out the Republics. I speak plainly when I say I distinctly refuse to give any such pledge. Diplomacy always must and always should go almost even handed with the progress of an army. It was so with the great

French Revolution. Mr. Pitt more than once sent Lord Malmesbury to France to negotiate during the war. During the Crimean War we had a conference at Vienna; that was while the war was going on; and it is the height of madness to lay down a hard and fast proposition that nothing will satisfy us until Bloemfontein and Pretoria are reduced. That is what the right hon. Gentleman says, but that is a matter which, I think, public opinion will have to consider. I venture to tell hon. Gentlemen opposite that there is a public opinion outside the Metropolis, and even if it be a fact that those who hold these opinions are a small minority, I find consolation in the reflection that in the long wars at the beginning of the century the cause of peace was advocated, though it was but by a small minority. They believed their cause just, and they stood by it, though their numbers fell low. I am convinced that these hot-headed doctrines are not the doctrines of Ministers, but of the London press and persons who do not propose to go to the front themselves. I believe at the right time the Government will not be afraid to let diplomacy find its place in our camps. Let the Government say, first of all, that all British territory must be cleared of the invaders, and the superiority of our arms asserted; but it is not necessary to say that the superiority of our arms can only be asserted by a great invasion and the final conquest of the two Republics. I implore the House to bear in mind the noble words of Lord Salisbury at the Mansion House when he declared that the war was not being waged by this country for the purpose of obtaining gold mines or for annexation of territory, as I understood him, and I hope correctly. Let the Government beware of doing anything by which it could be proclaimed that England, this free country, is the deadly enemy of the liberties of two small free States, and will only be satisfied with their destruction. Otherwise the gulf between the two sides of the House may grow wider than I believe it is now, and we might have to hurl back at you after many years the fierce quotation which Lord Cairns launched at us from his place in Parliament:

"In all the troubles which we ever bore,
We grieved, we sighed, we wept; we never blushed before."

I beg to move the Amendment of which I have given notice.

Amendment proposed—

"At the end of the Question to add the words, 'But we humbly express our regret at the want of knowledge, foresight, and judgment displayed by Your Majesty's advisers, alike in their conduct of South African affairs since 1895 and in their preparations for the war now proceeding.'"—(Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. DRAGE (Derby) said it was not his intention to follow the noble Lord into all the topics of his speech. The question was whether the war was just. With regard to the so-called Dutch conspiracy, he desired to lay before the House information that had been sent over to him during the last few days from Cape Colony. With regard to the question of whether the war is just, the House was aware that there were four signatories to the London Convention, one of whom was Mr. Du Toit, and his view was entirely in favour of the view taken by the Government. It would be remembered that after the retrocession in 1881, when the whole of South Africa was practically in favour of annexation, Mr. Du Toit started alone the agitation which eventually led to the Government giving way. Not only so, but he afterwards came to Pretoria, and in 1889 was the close adviser of President Kruger and the organiser of the Afrikaner Bond. Therefore both sides of the House would probably agree that the opinions of such a man were worthy of something more than passing attention. The hon. Member proceeded to say that it was in consequence of the manifesto of which extracts had been supplied to him that he became convinced that England was in the right and the Transvaal Government in the wrong. He referred to the utterances of Mr. Du Toit, and particularly to his remarkable statement that what the Transvaal fought for was not for independence, but the maintenance of injustice. That view was fully borne out by clergymen and Nonconformist ministers in South Africa. England, then, fought for the violated rights of Uitlanders, to whom she was responsible under the Convention. She fought for the maintenance of her position as the paramount power in South Africa, against the Transvaal, which promised to respect that supremacy by Article 4 of the Convention, but now openly defied it. The Transvaal fought not for independence, for England had repeatedly offered to guarantee that, but for the maintenance of injustice and for the vindication of an oligarchy which had enriched itself at the expense of the country. Quotations could be given from speeches by ministers of the Church of England, and by Nonconformists resident in Johannesburg and in Cape Town, in support of this view. He did not know whether the House was prepared to listen to more than one or two extracts from the utterances of these gentlemen, but they went to the root of the whole controversy. The Rev. Mr. Fisher, for ten years a minister at the Cape, said—

"He believed from the bottom of his heart that the conflict was inevitable, unless we were prepared to abandon the colonists to the most ruthless oppression the world had ever seen."

Again, the Natal Congregational Union, writing to the central body in England, said—

"Humanly speaking, the war was inevitable. The war now raging has long been pressed and prepared for by the Boers with a view to military and political dominion over the whole of South Africa, and the plea of fighting for independence has been but a blind to hide the real aim of the enormous military preparations of the Republics which began years before the Jameson raid."

The Rev. Charles Philip, Congregational minister at Johannesburg, said—

"All the ministers of the Free Churches believe the war was mere talk. A united Dutch Republic from the Zambesi to the Cape was the object, and the exclusion of the British from South Africa. The Boers have not only been preparing for the inevitable since the raid. The raid was largely the consequence of the preparations which preceded it. If any possibility of peace existed it lay in a united front being shown in the country. Unfortunately local writers were able to declare that England was divided in this matter, and that if the worst came to the worst the Liberal party or some foreign Government would prevent their independence being destroyed."

This seemed to show what the leaders of religious thought in the Church of

Mr. Drage.

England and among the Nonconformist body believed as to the attitude adopted by Her Majesty's Government. Another point in the speech of the noble Lord who moved the Amendment was the question of this so-called "conspiracy," which he (Mr. Drage) ventured to call an aspiration, or ambition, to oust the British from South Africa. There could be no doubt that there were a very large number of the Cape Dutch as loyal to the Throne as anyone; but from the time of Sir Bartle Frere and onwards the despatches sent home spoke of a great national Dutch movement which was hostile to the Crown. Cape Colonists traced the beginning of this movement, oddly enough, to an Englishman sent out by the Colonial Office—to Mr. Froude. It was not to ancient history that one needed to go to find the cause of this Dutch aspiration for a great national want. There were some hon. Members who had studied the Nihilist movement in Russia, and the Socialist movement in Germany, the Mafia in Sicily, or the Carbonari in Italy, and they would know that a great national movement must have an economic basis; it must also have a religious sentiment connected with it, a political organisation to carry it forward, and lastly, a great military organisation with a military leader to take command. These conditions, with the exception of the last, had existed in South Africa. The hon. Member enumerated the economic grounds which played their part in leading up to the present conflict. He cited President Kruger himself as to the origin of the trouble; while there was also in this connection the emancipation of the blacks. He had it on the authority of the Rev. W. Fisher that, "in the Transvaal, whatever injury a black man sustained, he had no chance of redress. In Johannesburg the Kaffirs were whipped without any trial for walking on the pavement; and a black man is also prevented from owning land." The hon. Gentleman also referred to the labour question and the administration of the liquor laws which prevailed at the present moment in the Transvaal, and in conclusion emphasised his belief that, in the opinion of men who were best able to judge, the war in which we are engaged was one of which the national conscience approved, and that the result of it would be the re-organisation of our military forces: military, as well as colonial and foreign, questions would be raised above the purview of party politics; and, lastly, he could not help thinking that Her Majesty's Government in considering the nature of the sacrifices of the colonies, would see the need of consulting statesmen in Canada, Australia, and South Africa with regard to the future organisation of the forces of the Crown. He declared that the honour of England was at stake and that we could not withdraw now from the contest in which we are involved. There might be divisions on both sides of the House; but he ventured to hope that the discussion would be conducted free from party spirit and with the sole aim in view of the welfare of the country at large.

MR. ROBSON (South Shields): I wish to make it perfectly clear, in supporting this Amendment, that I desire only to mark my sense of the inadequacy of the military preparations both before and since the war. I do not desire to cast the slightest reflection on the justice of our cause in South Africa or on the way in which, all things considered, that cause has been handled by Her Majesty's Government. There may be differences of opinion in regard to the skill with which the Government conducted the negotiations which preceded the war; but that question is a very minor question indeed compared with the supreme question of whether or not we are fighting a just cause. Some of my hon. friends have treated the war as unjust, or at all events they have created the impression that the cause for which we are fighting is in their view an inadequate and trivial cause. That is a very serious view to put before the country at a crisis like this. I do not believe for one moment that it is too late to discuss a question of this kind. I think it is important that the education of the people with regard to the issues of this war should be continued day by day. I do not believe that this country can ever carry on a great war with a bad conscience, and, as the country is now to be called upon to make a great and prolonged effort in regard to the war, that call can only be made successfully if we are able to put our claim on the ground of right. I have noticed with alarm the action taken by my right hon. friend the Member for Montrose, for there is no statesman whose moral judgment I more profoundly respect. By ignoring the real issues of this war; by magnifying to an extraordinary degree the mischief which may have been done by financiers who have always mixed themselves up in every great struggle since the world began; by dint of these things, the right hon. Gentleman has succeeded in casting around the origin of this war a vain suspicion or suggestion which has made many people believe that the war is unjust. If these are facts, then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose and hon. Members who agree with him are justified in their action; but if they are not facts, and they are wrong, as I contend they are, then it would be impossible for any body of men to do this country a graver disservice. The attitude of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose is the most singular of all. I do not gather that he denies the justice of this war, but he tells us that the questions at issue between the Boer Government and Uitlanders are not worth the bones of one of his constituents. That is rather a striking utterance to come from a statesman who recommended us not long ago to insist upon a five years franchise. That scarcely seems a consistent attitude to adopt for something which is not worth the bones of a single Scotsman. The right hon. Gentleman might also have thought of what must have been the feelings in what he himself has so eloquently described as "the stricken homes of England" when they are told that the cause for which their sons and brothers are fighting is a trivial cause, and that their blood has been wasted. If the right hon. Gentleman is right in his facts there is nothing more to be said, for I for one detest the jingoism which puts patriotism above the moral law. But what is the case which the right hon. Gentleman thinks inadequate? It is admitted to be the cause of political liberty for the majority of the inhabitants of the Transvaal. It is the cause of political liberty in a new country as big as France, which is open not only as a moral right but by solemn treaties to all new comers. It is the cause of racial equality, of education, of municipal government, of a free press, of public meeting, and of every right which makes men free—and that is the cause which we are told is not worth the bones of a single Scotsman. I do not wonder at the opinion he expresses when one goes further on in his speech and sees the supposed fact on which he bases his view. He says that whatever the grievances of the Uitlanders may have been nine-tenths of them would have been redressed by the franchise offered by the Boer Government. In regard to this, I hope my right hon. friend will forgive me if I use plain language, for his contention is not merely wrong, but it is absolutely and hopelessly ridiculous. Now what is the right hon. Gentleman's ground for this contention? I hope that in this House he will attempt to establish the statement which he has put before the country, for I challenge him to show a single concession, great or small, put forward by the Transvaal Government during these negotiations that was either worthy of unconditional acceptance or capable of unconditional acceptance. I suppose he referred to the so-called concessions with regard to the franchise. On this subject a most singular misapprehension has arisen which I had hoped might by this time have been removed, namely, that there was only a difference between us and the Transvaal Government merely of two years in the franchise. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin has himself frequently laid stress upon this point. Now, from what is it that this misconception arises? Before the Transvaal Franchise Act was passed at all, the Colonial Secretary was informed—some weeks before—that there was to be a seven years retrospective franchise. At that time the Act was undergoing daily many changes, and it appears that in his anxiety to come to some agreement with Mr. Kruger, the Colonial Secretary hastened to rejoice that on the basis of this promise there was merely two years between himself and Mr. Kruger. But when he made that statement the Act had not passed, and he had not seen it, and the right hon. Gentleman's statement was made not in reference to a performance, but in regard to a promise. Ever since that time that phrase of his has been bandied about on platforms, it has been echoed and re-echoed in the press, and it is stated that the only difference about which we are fighting is a difference of two years in the franchise. I think it is quite time that this statement ceased circulation. Now what is the fact about the franchise? Of course, what we were demanding was a general franchise for the Uitlanders, and that was what the Colonial Secretary hoped he was going to get. But the Act passed was in no sense what was expected, and was not intended to be a general franchise Act for the Uitlanders, for it was simply an Act enabling the Boer officials, with the consent of their superiors, in certain rather remarkable and almost impossible cases, to give the franchise to such Uitlanders as they might happen to be personally satisfied with. The Act is one long series of complicated provisions, all of which show two distinct and real objects on the part of the draftsman—the first is to make it impossible for any Uitlander to have a direct right to the franchise, and the second object is to make it possible for any official to exercise his discretion in giving the franchise to a Uitlander. It may be supposed that I have given a picturesque view of the Act, but the criticism which I give has been confirmed by two men who, of all men in the world, are the most competent to judge—I allude to Mr. Kruger and Mr. Reitz. Since I ventured to express my view as to the provisions of this Act, I have had forwarded to me a copy of a Transvaal paper dated the 13th of May, 1899, and that was the very time at which Mr. Kruger was framing his proposals for the Bloemfontein Conference. In that paper Mr. Kruger assures his burghers that they are quite wrong in supposing that he proposed to give the Uitlanders a general franchise, for he says, "No threats will induce me to give a general franchise to the Uitlanders." Mr. Reitz has also made a statement to a similar effect, for he has referred to the practical impossibility of giving a general franchise to the Uitlanders. That disposes of the argument that the Transvaal Government had given us a substantial concession by the Franchise Act. As long as they conferred on their officials the right to give the franchise where they thought fit, that was not a concession to the Uitlanders in the Transvaal. I do not want to take up the time of the House by going into the various diplomatic stages of the negotiations, but let me ask the House to consider these statements in the light of the subsequent offer of a five years franchise, about which we hear so much. The five years franchise was offered as an alternative to any inquiry into the seven years franchise. The five years franchise was offered, but when it was put forward the Colonial Secretary, who is accused of having accepted it in ambiguous terms, at once met it with a qualified acceptance, and suggested that England and the Transvaal should sit down together and join in an inquiry, and endeavour to arrange the terms or conditions which should attach to the franchise, because the conditions were everything and the period named was unimportant. If you make certain conditions it matters not whether the qualifying period is one year or ten. Mr. Kruger had no great objection to offer to the five years franchise, but when the conditions which would attach to the acquisition of the franchise were stated in the next despatch the five years franchise was dropped. Can it ever have been intended to be accepted, and is there any reason to believe that the five years franchise would have been different to the seven years franchise, which Mr. Kruger himself admitted was not a general Franchise Act at all? I venture to say that the five years franchise was a delusive offer never intended to be accepted in any substantial sense, and we can pretty well guess now what was intended, for it gave the Boers time to complete their military preparations. While my right hon. friend the Member for Montrose was talking about his eight-day clock, and the Colonial Secretary about his hour-glass, Mr. Kruger had his eye on the barometer, and he was waiting for the proper season to begin his operations. So much for the statement that any substantial concessions have been offered to us by the Transvaal. There is another difficulty, and I hope the House will bear with me while I deal with it, because it seems to me to be at the root of this trouble. The question is asked why we have any right to insist upon any franchise at all for the Uitlanders. It seems to be assumed that these unfortunate Uitlanders are a sort of aliens with no right to share in the Government under which they live, and with no claim to protection. I have heard them continually compared to aliens, but there could not be a more patent misconception of the facts. An alien has no right of entry or residence in the country to which he goes; he may live there and trade there, but he does so only on precarious administrative promises, which may be revoked at any moment. What is the position of the Uitlander? He is in the Transvaal by a right as valid, both from the legal and the moral point of view, as any Boer in the place.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): In respect of commerce and trade.

MR. ROBSON: That is exactly what I am dealing with. An alien has no right in respect of commerce and trade, but the Uitlander has, for he is a lawful inhabitant of the Transvaal, and that is by no means the same state as that of the alien. Let it be remembered that, so far as regards the settlement of the Transvaal and the development of the trade and commerce of the Transvaal, Boers and Britons have absolutely equal rights. Now we have the Uitlander there in the position of an unenfranchised inhabitant. What is the position of Boer and Briton there? The Boers claim to be there by right of conquest, and the Uitlanders claim to be there by right of Convention, and that is a title not worse than conquest from a legal point of view, and if anything rather better than conquest from a moral point of view. I am quite content to put my argument as to the rights of the Uitlanders under the Convention of 1881 on one side, and put my case on the broadest possible basis under the Convention of 1884. That Convention at all events puts the Uitlander, as I have stated before, in the position of an unenfranchised inhabitant of a new country. Let me ask the House to consider the Boers as being the original settlers and conquerors of a new country. It is very misleading indeed to draw parallels between newer countries. What would be said if in any other of the new countries of the world the original settlers and conquerors pursued the same policy as that which has been pursued by the Boers? What would happen, for instance, in America? Suppose that in America they decided that all emigrants should go there as a subject race, that they should not have the franchise, that the German Government should not interfere, and that the Germans should have no claim to interference on their behalf, and that the right of public meeting, free press, and many other matters were to be under the guardianship of the original inhabitants of the country. What would be said of that state of things? Suppose my right hon. friend the Member for Montrose recommended patience to these outraged people. That is not the view which the Germans would take. Obviously the true principle is that if settlers choose to go into a new country and appropriate as much of the area as they like, allowing for the expansion of their own race, they have a right to choose whatever government they like; but if they go into a new tract of the earth's surface and take a portion as big as France which they know they can never develop themselves, but which they allow to be developed by other races, then I say they have no right to keep that country, and they cannot claim to keep it as a right except upon the terms that they should govern it in ways consistent with modern civilisation. It seems to me ludicrous that the Boers should claim the right to invite other races there and treat them as subject races. Of course due allowance should be made for the rapidity of development and growth of population, especially in the Transvaal. That is an allowance which everybody acknowledges ought to be made. I ask again for fair consideration of this question. Could any proposal be more moderate or any suggestion more reasonable than the proposal of the Colonial Secretary that we should take only eight Members out of a Parliament of thirty-two, although in proportion we were entitled to equality? In our adjacent colonies we gave all the inhabitants equality, and yet in the Transvaal we have never asked for it. All we have asked for is a locus standi for the majority of the lawful inhabitants of the Transvaal. I venture to say that the demand put forward by this country was a reasonable demand based on just principles. There has never been from the beginning of the time named in this Amendment down to now a single demand put forward to the Transvaal which could be said in any way to menace its independence. The Boers may have suspicions, but we cannot prevent that. We were careful in 1896 to put forward demands which should not interfere even with their franchise. The Colonial Secretary then appeared as the champion of a new Home Rule. That was refused. If all the Boers had wanted was liberty for themselves they would have welcomed that Home Rule solution offered by the Colonial Secretary. By refusing it they showed clearly that what they wanted was not liberty for themselves, but dominion over us. The history of the last thirty years has been marked by all sorts of aggressive movements beyond their boundaries by the Boers, all of which were breaches of the Convention. In 1891 there was organised a raid on a warlike basis with far more men than Dr. Jameson had, the object being to appropriate the country of the Chartered Company to the north. Who can doubt that President Kruger knew of that raid? We have heard a great deal of the alleged complicity of the Colonial Secretary in the Jameson raid, but does anybody doubt the complicity of President Kruger in the raid of 1891, when the Boers went to the borders of the territory of the Chartered Company, and were met—by whom? By Dr. Jameson. It was not until they were told that they would be opposed by forces not merely of the Chartered Company—which they were prepared to resist and overcome—but by the forces of Her Majesty the Queen, that they went back. It is well to remember that episode when we hear so much righteous indignation expressed as to the Jameson raid. If there was one person who at all events had no right to complain of the Jameson raid it was Mr. Kruger, because so far as he and his Government were concerned the raid was an act of not unnatural retaliation. We are told that the Transvaal is armed merely because of the Jameson raid. Can it be believed that, raid or no raid, if the Transvaal Government had made up its mind not to enfranchise the majority of its population, that sooner or later there would not have been either revolution or war? The arming of the Transvaal would not have been a gun less if there had been no raid, always provided that they had made up their mind not to alter the existing political situation, which depended on great inequality between the two races. The moment the Transvaal Government came to the conclusion that they would support the system they must have known there would be war—raid or no raid. But the Boers knew more than that. In addition to knowing that support of the existing system involved rebellion or war, they also knew that they could not treat the English as a disfranchised and subject race in one part of South Africa without destroying the power of England over the whole of South Africa. Therefore, they knew that if they were to maintain their system of race government they must strike for a wider supremacy, and they got ready for it. We did not, and that is why I am going to vote for this Amendment. Instead of getting ready for the war we preferred the policy of the right hon. Member for Montrose, and wasted year after year in a policy of unwise and futile Conventions. The Boers, however, knew better. There is no occasion to imagine the kind of dramatic underground conspiracy which has been described by the noble Lord: there is not the slightest occasion to suppose a necessity for any such conspiracy. The necessities of the situation were too palpable, they needed no secret propaganda. Every Dutchman in South Africa must have known those necessities as I have ventured to state them to-night—viz., that as they were determined not to extend political equality to the English in the Transvaal, there must be war; and it must be a war which would settle not merely the Transvaal question, but also the question of the supremacy in South Africa. "Independence" is the formula of the Afrikaner Bond for the exclusion of England from all internal affairs in South Africa. "Independence" is the formula of President Kruger for the exclusion of the English from political liberty in the Transvaal. There is no occasion for conspiracy; each understands the other perfectly well. This policy, so far from being a conspiracy, is the avowed object and the inevitable preliminary of the war. When every other argument has failed, we have references to the "trail of finance" over the whole business. I would ask my hon. friends to try to get the true measure of the financial aspect of this question. What political revolution has there ever been in which finance in one form or another has not played an important and predominant part? Men do not make revolutions for academical or philosophical reasons; they make revolutions for material reasons, they make revolutions for £ s. d. But behind every one of those financial questions stands the great principle of human liberty and human freedom. What are the financial grievances in the Transvaal? I myself care nothing for mere financial reasons—as far as I am concerned I have not and have never had the remotest interest in the world with them—and they are only important according to my view as indicating the absence of political equality. In every revolution, although principles of liberty are at stake, it is ultimately some small question of finance which occasions the outbreak. Do not let it be supposed that because there is in this, as in every other revolution, a financial element, therefore there is not present in it also that element which we all respect and regard, viz., the great question of human liberty and human freedom. The importance of the present conflict lies in the fact that the future of the Great South African nation is at stake. There is no sort of gain possible to England from the conflict. We may lose much, while at best we can but establish another Free State in the Transvaal. But what does it mean to South Africa? The question for South Africa is whether the millions of men who will one day inhabit that great territory should work together in harmony and co-operate as members of equal races, or whether there should be a new nation unlike all the other new nations of the world—a new nation with a great part of its population disfranchised, and without political liberty, in which the majority are subject to the tyranny of race. I desire, at all events, to make it clear that I support this Amendment on the ground that there has been undoubtedly a lack of care and an insufficient degree of preparation, both before the war and in the conduct of military preparations since the war began. At all events, as far as I am concerned, I will not have it supposed that I charge the Government with having plunged this country into a war which is either unjust or which could reasonably have been avoided.

MR. EVELYN CECIL (Hertfordshire, Hertford): I must express considerable surprise at the form in which the Amendment has been moved, and I do not see much practical force in most of the charges which the noble Lord has brought against the Government. Virtually he endeavours to crucify the Government upon the horns of this dilemma: either it is true the war was inevitable, or it is true the war was not inevitable. The noble Lord, if I may say so, is too logical. You can very well argue now that it is true that war was inevitable or that it was not, but you could not before war was declared expect the Government to say that war was or was not inevitable. The most the Government could say was that they hoped war would be avoided. If they had taken up the position that war could be avoided I suppose they would not have made the proper preparations. The noble Lord also seemed to take it for granted that if anything happened to President Kruger, who is 76 years of age, most of these troubles would be avoided and the Government be able to tide over negotiations until they completely disappeared. That is not at all a position which can be taken up. There are other President Krugers to follow; especially there is Mr. Reitz, who is an accurate representative in every respect of President Kruger's intentions and wishes. Those intentions are easily judged now by the light of events, but they have been fairly obvious since the year 1881. President Kruger has never intended that the Uitlanders should be in the same position as regards the franchise as his own burghers. On the contrary, he was determined to preserve special privileges to his burghers which were not to be enjoyed by Uitlanders. He went so far as to tell me that he did not see why people who came into the country at a time subsequent to its original start should be allowed to swamp the original burghers who were there. I humbly suggested that it was perfectly reasonable that educated men when they had resided a sufficient time in the country should have the franchise, and that they should be treated as they would be treated by every civilised Government. But that was not the view of the President, and I am convinced that under no circumstances would he have given the franchise in the way the British Government justly demanded it. Equally I think it was his intention to undermine by degrees the supremacy of Great Britain. For many years past he has been striving to work in such a way as gradually to sap the power and influence of England throughout South Africa. There is no doubt now what was his intention. It was unmasked by Mr. Reitz when he stated in the despatch of last May that the Transvaal claimed to be a sovereign international State. That was the issue he evidently had in his mind, but it was one which from his point of view he put forward rather sooner than perhaps was wise. But when he had put it forward he saw his mistake, and endeavoured to brush it aside by suggesting that if the discussion of the Transvaal's position was likely to prevent a peaceful issue of the negotiations it had better be put aside altogether. That was not a position which this country could have tolerated for one moment, and it cannot be too often remembered that at that time this country was supported by the whole of Europe in its contention, because when the Transvaal desired to be represented at the Peace Conference at Brussels as an independent State this country protested, and the Powers of Europe said that the Transvaal could not be admitted. But President Kruger has for years past been endeavouring to encroach upon the territory of England. We all know the Zulu War was largely undertaken to save the Transvaal from disturbances; but nevertheless, directly the war was at an end and there was a question of the resettlement of territory, we found President Kruger and his adherents laying the foundations of a new Republic in a corner of Zululand which they had succeeded in annexing. The same was the case in regard to the Stellaland raids. The Convention of 1884 laid down specific boundaries of the Transvaal; these boundaries did not include the districts in Stellaland. That Convention was signed on February 27th, 1884, and in the spring of that year a British Commissioner was sent to Stellaland, and a British Protectorate was proclaimed. In the summer of that year disturbances occurred in connection with the native chiefs, and on the 10th December President Kruger—as he explained, in the interests of humanity—proclaimed that those territories were part of the Transvaal. This was practically, if not actually, a breach of the Convention which had just been signed, and it shows the spirit which has animated President Kruger throughout these negotiations. We can trace the same spirit in the perpetual and systematic way in which the President has been arming of recent years. It is idle to say that the importations of arms were merely for defensive purposes, and that there was no hostile intention as far as this country was concerned. It is now pretty common knowledge, whatever it may have been previously, that the Portuguese Customs in Delagoa Bay will certify that at least 200,000 rifles were imported through that port to the Transvaal during the last three years. That figure is the more remarkable when we remember that just before the war President Kruger himself stated that the whole number of his fighting burghers amounted to about 30,000. Even allowing for over 15,000 from the Orange Free State there was an enormous margin left out of these 200,000. What were they for? Allow two rifles to each man, and there is still a gigantic margin. I do not believe it is unfair to suggest that that margin was intended for providing with rifles the Dutchmen of Cape Colony, whom President Kruger hoped he would have to support him. That goes far to show that, however the negotiations were conducted, war would not have been avoided. Various fallacies have been put forward in this debate and on other occasions by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I think an early opportunity should be taken to comment upon them and expose the mistakes. One of the chief fallacies we have heard on recent occasions has been that of the right hon. Member for Montrose—that this is merely a capitalists' struggle. I can assure him that this is by no means a capitalists' struggle. It is a mistake to suppose that all the Jewish capitalists are on one side and all the people oppressed by capitalists on the other. There are Jewish and other capitalists who are strongly concerned with the opposite side. There are Jewish capitalists who are holders of many concessions from the Transvaal Government, and whose personal interest it is to maintain the corrupt system of that Government. We are also told by the Leader of the Opposition that the Government ought to have known last summer that the Free State would join with the Transvaal if a war broke out. I demur to that very much. The reason the Free State joined the Transvaal is a very simple one. It is simply the race feeling. I remember perfectly well hearing the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition denying altogether in this House that any race feeling existed in South Africa. That being so, he certainly was not at the time in possession of the real reason why the Free State has joined the Transvaal, and I do not think he then could have been brought to the conclusion which he now says should have been arrived at. Then much is said by hon. Gentlemen opposite about the loyalty of the Afrikaners. Some members of the Afrikaner Bond certainly were loyal to the Government of the Queen, and felt strongly that although they were British South Africans they were also British citizens, but, nevertheless, the Afrikaner Bond was the link which connected the loyal Cape Dutch with disloyal conspirators, and I am sorry to say that the loyal Cape Dutch have not been able to see their way to resist the influence brought to bear on them. We have discussed this Amendment mainly with regard to the past negotiations and past policy of the Government. We have still to discuss subjects which are intimately connected with our troops. When the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition said that the number of our troops was ludicrously insufficient it crossed my mind that he had been speaking a great deal about ex post facto opinion, and I wondered whether that was not an ex post facto opinion of his own. It certainly has that appearance, because he used no expression last summer to suggest that he thought the number of troops was hopelessly insufficient. He certainly gave no indication then that would enable me to praise his opinion now as one of foresight. Then we have to remember that this war is being carried on at a distance of 6,000 miles from the base, and is in that respect unprecedented in the history of the world. It is not an easy matter to send troops to fight 6,000 miles away and to keep up an adequate commissariat supply. That is a question which ought to be strongly borne in mind when the action of the Government is so glibly condemned. In the great national crisis in which we stand it is important to know what is the approximate strength of the Boers, and I have it from a Boer source, which I think I can reasonably trust, that the number of their troops in the field at the present moment ranges between 70,000 and 80,000, of whom 30,000 are surrounding Ladysmith. That is a considerable force for us to cope with, and I think, whoever may have underestimated the real strength of the Boers, we should lose no time now. I believe that the country is ready and willing to vote an adequate number of men to bring this war to a successful conclusion. If 50,000 or 100,000 more men are required, I am sure the country will gladly provide them without the smallest demur, and I believe the Government would be acting in the most popular way if it promptly determined to send out a large additional number of troops to reinforce our army in Natal and Cape Colony. The country does not wish to spare either men or money, and it will gladly support in the magnificent manner it has hitherto shown any proposition put forward in this sense. I should like to say a few words as to the immense value of the colonial troops from all parts of the Empire. Colonial troops are, I believe, very well fitted for the special kind of warfare required in South Africa. But most of all I should like to pay a tribute to the troops who have volunteered in South Africa itself, such as the Imperial Light Horse, the South African Light Horse, and similar bodies, for the great services they have rendered and are rendering. The knowledge of the country which they possess and the keenness they show are most valuable, and the number of men still ready to enlist to fight the battles of the Empire reflects very great credit on the colony and shows the unity of our Empire. I trust that whatever is done in the prosecution of the war will be done with the object of bringing it to no other termination than the annexation of the two Republics. I believe that is the only solution which is likely in any degree to soothe the unfortunate state of the disaffected countries. Certainly they will not be soothed by the re-establishment of the corrupt system of administration which existed in the Transvaal. If the franchise is re-instituted, the present generation even will be benefited by the unequalled labours of the Boers. Nothing but a revolution which will round with a new Government is likely to do that. That will do for the nation and maintain the unity of the Empire and the enter fully into the questions which the Amendment raises. I, therefore, merely desire to express the concurrence which I feel with the remarks which have fallen from speakers on both sides of the House with regard to the sympathy felt with the troops fighting the battles of the country in South Africa. There are some matters, no doubt, in connection with this campaign on which we all are at one. We are at one with regard to the feeling of sympathy with our troops: we are at one also with the view that the ultimatum of President Kruger made war inevitable, whatever was the case before. But, apart from one or two questions of that kind in which we all concur there is ample room for difference with regard to details, and the Amendment which has been moved concentrates and focusses as far as possible those differences of opinion which the House of Commons is not only entitled but bound to inquire into. If the object of the House to-night were to investigate the whole of the questions alike of tactics, strategy, and politics arising during the course of the last five years there would be very little time left to investigate them. In my opinion some of these matters ought clearly to be excluded from an inquiry of this kind. For instance, on the subject of tactics this House is bound to be silent. In the first place, tactics can only be judged after full knowledge obtained on the spot. To criticise generals on the field with regard to one particular battle is not only an invidious task, and one in which it is easy to be misled, but in addition one which it is only possible for us to attempt after full investigation of maps, which is not obtainable here, to deal with fully. Therefore, if tactics were to come before the purview of an inquiry in this House, the inquiry should be strictly limited. Then again with regard to strategy, there is a prima facie case for inquiry, but the matter is so much one of detail and of facts that it is almost impossible to deal with it in connection with

Amendment. And yet in regard to it there is considerable difficulty in separating questions of strategy from questions of policy. For instance, it was on a question of policy rather than of strategy that Sir George White's plan was altered to a very considerable extent. He was not in favour of holding Dundee and Glencoe, but he was induced by the Governor of Natal to hold these advanced posts in spite of the danger to which it might give rise. In connection with that matter, it will be desirable to press the right hon. Gentleman further than he has been pressed to-night. He told us that the Government in this country had not brought any influence, direct or indirect, to bear on any general in the field with regard to the conduct of the campaign, and he pointed out with reference to Dundee and Glencoe, that the Governor of Natal gave the advice he did on the advice of his own Ministers, and without consultation with Ministers in this country. The Governor of Natal is, after all, a representative of the Crown, and is directly responsible to the Colonial Secretary. Therefore, it is impossible to throw the blame on Ministers in Natal, because the Governor was not bound to act on their advice until authorised or counselled to do so by the Colonial Secretary, and manifestly it was his duty to have communicated on a point of such great importance with the Colonial Secretary. If that applied to Dundee and Glencoe, surely the same set of considerations applied also to the holding of Ladysmith, and to the diversion of troops from Cape Colony into Natal for the purpose of rescuing that town. We are given to understand that the Government of this country brought no pressure to bear on the generals. I quite accept that, but what we wish to know is whether some advice was not given by Sir Alfred Milner to the effect that very serious moral results would be produced if Kimberley and Ladysmith were not rescued, and unless we are satisfied that persons holding positions of civil authority in South Africa did not give advice of that kind we shall still be of opinion, after what has transpired in the despatches of Sir George White and also from information derived from other quarters that a certain amount of pressure was brought to bear on the generals which induced them to alter the original plan of campaign, which was to press forward due north from Cape Colony into the Orange Free State, and in that way to indirectly relieve the garrisons of Ladysmith and Kimberley without dividing their forces into subordinate expeditions. Those are matters with regard to which it seems to me some further explanation will have to be given. They are to some extent questions of strategy, but they are also in part questions of policy, and it seems to me impossible that we should altogether ignore them in view of the valuable lives which are at stake, and which have been lost owing to the errors which are now almost universally admitted to have been committed. Passing from questions of tactics and strategy, and also from questions on the border line between strategy and policy, and coming to questions of policy itself, it seems to me that there have been a great many points dealt with in the course of this debate which will have to be dealt with more fully. The hon. and learned Member for South Shields supported this Amendment, though on somewhat curious grounds. He drew a very elaborate and fine distinction between an alien and an unenfranchised inhabitant. I am bound to say, as far as I have been able to follow his argument, that its logical conclusion appears to be that the Uitlander in the Transvaal who had not the franchise was like Mahomet's coffin—between heaven and earth. He was not a citizen of the Transvaal, and he had lost the citizenship of his own country. That would be the logical consequence of the very anomalous condition of an unenfranchised inhabitant of the Transvaal. In that connection one must recognise that in the steps which were taken to secure the just claims of the Uitlanders the ground taken was not simply that they were without the franchise, but that on account of the Convention of 1884 and also by virtue of certain principles of international law they were entitled to certain rights of which they were unjustly deprived. That ground having been taken, it was surely impossible to suppose that the Uitlanders occupied the very anomalous position attributed to them by the hon. and learned Member. With regard to the questions of policy which were embodied in what is known as Sir Alfred Milner's Policy No. 1, it seems to me we cannot justly find fault with steps having been taken by the Government to secure that the Uitlanders should obtain the franchise, and for two reasons. First of all because when Lord Ripon was at the Colonial Office he took steps by amicable, friendly, and diplomatic means to secure that the franchise should be extended, and in the next place on general grounds it is obviously in accordance with the principles of freedom that every effort should be made to secure equality. But what we object to is the particular methods by which those steps were taken, the particular methods of diplomacy by which it was attempted to carry these principles into practice. If the Government had acted in regard to Policy No. 1 on the lines laid down by previous Governments on the principle on which Lord Ripon tried to carry it into effect—no serious objection could be offered, but what was objectionable was that the refusal of the conditions involved in Policy No. 1 should practically have been made the subject of a casus belli. Where a casus belli might arise would be any disregard on the part of the Government of the Transvaal of the Convention of 1884, or else any injury done to British rights in defiance of the principles of international law. But Policy No. 1, as put forward by Sir Alfred Milner, did not involve any direct violation of the Convention of 1884, but it attempted to secure for the Uitlanders something over and above what was recognised by that Convention, and it was not an attempt to redress some particular injury or wrong suffered by British subjects in defiance of the principles of international law. If it had been one or other then its rejection might have constituted a casus belli. As regards Policy No. 2 put forward by the Government at a later date, as a matter of fact it was never formulated, and never had any form or shape. It meant that particular wrongs or injuries suffered by British subjects in defiance of known principles of international law should be tabulated in a form intelligible to the people of this country and to the people of Europe. If the Government had taken that line at an earlier date it would not only have the effect of enlightening to a great extent public opinion in this country as to the exact state of things, but would also have the effect of removing many misunderstandings which prevail in Europe, and which have emphasised the very artful manner in which the representatives of the Boer Republic in Europe have manipulated the opinions of the European press. If that policy had been put forward as a definite form misunderstanding would have been removed and we should not have arrayed against us the weight of moral opinion which though it may not have any particular effect on the progress of the struggle now being carried on in South Africa nevertheless acts as a moral help to the Boers, and also as a possible reserve of strength to them in view of possible complications that might ensue from the war. If Policy No. 2 had been put forward at an earlier stage in a clear and definite form it would not only have the effect of setting the Government right in the opinion of many in this country who were not able to consider Policy No. 1 as right in accordance with the principles of international law and the Convention of 1884, but it would also have the effect of making opinion in Europe less hostile to us than it actually has been during the course of this campaign. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House in his speech referred to the conditions, and the only conditions, on which it would be possible for peace to be concluded, and on that point he tried to elicit the opinion of the Leader of the Opposition, and while endeavouring to elicit that opinion he appeared to be very careful not to give any opinion himself as to when those conditions would arise. The Leader of the Opposition laid down firstly that it would be necessary to bring to an end the invasion of British territory; secondly, that the war should be crowned for the British arms; and thirdly, that the paramountcy of the Crown in South Africa must be maintained unimpaired.

It being midnight, the debate stood adjourned.

BALLOT FOR BILLS, AND MOTIONS FOR THE FIRST FOUR TUESDAYS.

"That no Bills, other than Government

Bills, be introduced in anticipation of the ballot, and that all Members who desire to ballot, whether for Bills, or Motions for the first four Tuesdays of the session, do hand in their names at the Table during the sitting of the House on the first or second day of the session, and that a copy of such notices be handed in at the latest during the sitting of the House on the third day of the session :

“ That the ballot for the precedence of the said Bills and Motion be taken on the third day of the session at a convenient time and place to be appointed by Mr. Speaker, and that the introduction and First Reading of Bills on the fourth day be taken before Questions and as soon after Three o'clock as Mr. Speaker may deem convenient.”—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

MR. DUNCOMBE (Cumberland, Egremont) said he intended to move an Amendment to the resolution in order to afford himself an opportunity of calling attention to desirable alterations in the rules of procedure. He had noticed in previous sessions an extraordinary reluctance on the part of the Government, the Leader of the House, and the Front Bench generally, to allow the House to consider in any way the rules of procedure. Yet that, after all, was a matter in which the House was deeply interested, and as he could see no other chance of bringing on the question, he had been forced to propose an Amendment on the present occasion. It did not seem to him to be a dignified proceeding that the House should allot the days to be devoted to the discussion of private members' Bills in a haphazard manner. The present plan was what he might call a gamble. Numbers were drawn at haphazard. The effect of the Amendment would, on the other hand, be to make sure that precedence was given to Bills in which the majority of the Members of the House were interested. Surely that was a fair and reasonable proposal. It was only natural that precedence should be given to such Bills as those in which, for or against, the largest number of Members were interested. Of course, some objection might be raised even to that. It might be said, for instance, that the same Bill would take precedence session after session. That, however, might easily be guarded against by an arrangement that when a Bill had once been fully discussed it should not have precedence in any subsequent session of the same Parliament. It would, he submitted, be more in consonance with the dignity of Parliament, and better for the orderly conduct of its proceedings, if the motion just made by the First Lord of the Treasury were altered in the manner he ventured to propose.

Amendment proposed—

“ In line 4, after the word ‘ names,’ to insert the words, ‘ together with the name of the Bill or motion for which they desire precedence.’ ”
—(Mr. Duncombe.)

Question proposed—“ That those words be there inserted.”

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I hope the hon. Gentleman does not allege that either the Government or I have any desire to burke any legitimate discussion on our rules of procedure. Surely in the last four or five sessions we have had more debate in that direction than in the years before. As regards this particular Amendment, the rule I have proposed was framed simply for the convenience of the House, and it has been found to work well and has met with general approval. No substantial complaint, so far as I have heard, has ever been raised against it, and while I shall be pleased to have its operation carefully watched, and shall not shrink from proposing or supporting any alteration which may be found to be necessary, I do think that until some weakness has been proved to exist it would be well to leave it in the form in which it now stands.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I think the right hon. Gentleman is wise in not summarily adopting this proposed alteration of the rule. The object of the hon. Member who proposes it is, I presume, to arrive at some better way of determining the priority of private Members' Bills. At present we trust to blind fortune. The ballot has at all events one advantage, and that is that no one is to blame except fortune if a given Bill is not discussed. I quite admit that this is not a very brilliant method of conducting our debates, or the discussions of any serious assembly; but every other mode which has been proposed would be subject to grave objection, and even that suggested by the hon. Member would be open to the strong objection that hon. Members would be continually canvassed in advance for their support, and the Paper would—especially in the recess, when promises are easily given—be covered with their names. No doubt this is a matter we should bear in mind. Our rules of procedure are certainly open to improvement, but I think it would be rash on our part to make the proposed alteration without further inquiry.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said they had been told by the right hon. Gentleman that the selection of measures for discussion was left to blind fortune, and that that was not a proper procedure for an assembly of this kind. But he would point out that the selection was not entirely left to blind fortune. Syndicates were occasionally formed of persons in favour of certain Bills, and these did their best to correct the errors of blind fortune, and to put pressure upon her which, being a lady, she was not always able to withstand. Further than that, he would like to point out that if the Amendment were adopted it would, while giving precedence to some measures, altogether prevent the discussion of others in which only a few Members were interested. The First Lord of the Treasury had said that of late years improvement had been made in the procedure of the House. With that he did not quite agree.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, changes.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Changes for the worse. But in view of the serious events this House had now to consider he thought it would be better not to make the proposed change. The hon. Member for Egremont might rest content with having called attention to the matter, especially as the right hon. Gentleman had undertaken to consider the situation with a view to possibly effecting an improvement at some future day.

MR. DUNCOMBE: After what has fallen from the Leader of the House and the Leader of the Opposition, I do not intend to press the matter further, and I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.

Ordered, That no Bills other than Government Bills be introduced in anticipation of the ballot, and that all Members who desire to ballot, whether for Bills or Motions for the first four Tuesdays of the session, do hand in their names at the Table during the sitting of the House on the first or second day of the session, and that a copy of such notices be handed in at the latest during the sitting of the House on the third day of the session.

That the ballot for the precedence of the said Bills and Motions be taken on the third day of the session at a convenient time and place to be appointed by Mr. Speaker, and that the introduction and First Reading of Bills on the fourth day be taken before Questions and as soon after three o'clock as Mr. Speaker may deem convenient.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

SECOND DAY'S DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment [30th January] to Question [30th January], "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as followeth:—

Most Gracious Sovereign—

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament." — (Captain Pretyman.)

And which Amendment was, "At the end of the Question, to add the words—

'But we humbly express our regret at the want of knowledge, foresight, and judgment displayed by Your Majesty's advisers, alike in their conduct of South African affairs since 1895 and in their preparations for the war now proceeding.'" — (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice.)

Question again proposed,—"That those words be there added."

Debate resumed.

*MR. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): Last night when the debate was interrupted under the rules of the House I was endeavouring to lay before it certain propositions which, with permission, I will recapitulate in two or three sentences. The first was that there were certain portions of the subject raised by the Speech which were necessarily excluded from this debate. One of them was the question of tactics, and the other was that of strategy, and to these reference could only be made under certain limitations. For instance, on the question of tactics, the conduct of a particular battle depended to a certain extent on the resources which were at the command of the general—resources in the shape of men and ammunition. Those resources in their turn depended on the organisation at headquarters, and such limitations must therefore be taken into account. Again, in regard to strategy and the conduct of a campaign, certain limitations must also be observed. We have an instance of that in the case of the occupation of Dundee and Glencoe in spite of the fact that the military judgment of Sir George White was against the retention of those two places. That matter has already been slightly touched upon, but I hope that in the course of this debate we shall get a definite answer to the question whether the civil authorities in Natal and Cape Colony had exercised on other generals in command pressure analogous to that which they brought to bear on Sir George White in regard to Dundee and Glencoe. The right hon. Gentleman has certainly given a definite and specific answer in reference to those two places; but does it not naturally occur to him that if it were possible for Sir Hely Hutchinson to exercise pressure in regard to those two particular cases it would also be possible for other civil authorities at the Cape, not themselves military men, to exercise similar pressure with regard to Ladysmith and Kimberley?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I have no reason to think so.

*MR. STEVENSON: It is well known that military opinion was originally in favour of sending an army northwards into the Orange Free State for the purpose of advancing into the Transvaal. Why was that plan of campaign departed from? Whose influence was it that caused the departure? Was the departure made at the direct instigation of the Government of this country, or indirectly through its accredited agents at the Cape? I think we are entitled to know that, for in the view of many the carrying out of such a plan of campaign would indirectly have effected the relief of Ladysmith and Kimberley, while it would also have carried the war into the enemy's country. Still, apart from these limitations regarding tactics and strategy, there are various other subjects which properly come within the purview of the debate. There are the questions of administration and of policy. These are a little difficult to disentangle one from the other. On the Government side during the past few weeks there have undoubtedly appeared to be two distinct tendencies of opinion—one which looked upon the war as inevitable, and the other which considered that it might have been avoided. Those who looked upon the war as having been inevitable were inclined to put the whole blame on the administration of it, and that subject is of course not excluded from the present debate; while those who did not hold that it was inevitable preferred to think that the policy was to blame. A similar difference of opinion presented itself in the course of the debate last night. On the question of policy there are two points to which the attention of the House should be directed, the policy put forward by Sir Alfred Milner and the policy put forward by the Colonial Secretary in 1896, with regard to the separate treatment of the Rand. We should like to know why the proposals put forward by the Colonial Secretary were allowed to be dropped after the small rebuff he received and were not brought forward in another form. I venture to think that the main object the Government should have in view, having regard to the unsettled condition of things in South Africa and apart from the war being inevitable or not, should be to make such an impression on the public opinion of Europe as to render that opinion not hostile, as it is now, but favourable to us. Now the only way to have done that would have been to act in strict accordance with international law, and you would have done that if you had based your case on any distinct or specific violation of the Convention of 1884 or the special rules of international law. But another question that was raised by

Second Day.

Sir Alfred Milner was the question of the franchise. That was a perfectly praiseworthy effort, but surely it was one for friendly arrangement and not one which should have been a casus belli in the last resort. If you base your case on international law you must do it within strict limits. Any violation of the Convention of 1884 would have given the Government not only reasonable excuses for, but a just right of intervention, and if there were particular wrongs under which British subjects were labouring they were not only a fair matter for diplomatic representations, but might in the last resort have furnished a valid reason for action of a more serious character. But it seems to me that the Government have injured the British case in the eyes of Europe by not taking the strongest line upon which they can base their claim. As it is they have not done justice to their case, because instead of basing their claim on what was covered by policy No. 2 they attracted the concentrated attention of the public throughout the world on the particular points of policy No. 1, and that is where the British case was weakest from the point of view of international law. We know now why the Secretary of State for the Colonies did not persevere with the policy which he had adopted. He met with some rebuff not only at the hands of the Boer Government, but also at the hands of the Uitlanders who were not satisfied. But although the Secretary of State for the Colonies is a man of great versatility, and in 1899 pressed for the franchise in one form or another, he failed to press for the earlier proposal in different forms and at different stages. Whether the proposal for Home Rule in the Rand was really satisfactory, and why the Colonial Secretary did not bring his proposals forward in another form, does not much matter now; but I think anyone can see for himself that a proposal for a long lease of the Rand would have afforded a very fair basis for discussion, both in 1896 and in the years that followed; and there would have been a good deal to be said not only from our own point of view, but also from the point of view of the Uitlanders and the Boers. There were the two populations, the mining population and the pastoral population, to be considered. You would have created a more favourable condition of things, and by claiming that status for them you would have put them in a less anomalous position. A man cannot be a consistent citizen of two nationalities. A citizen of the Transvaal would cease to be a British citizen. If, on the other hand, instead of creating that anomalous position you had effected a long lease of the Rand, the Uitlanders would have still retained their status as British citizens, and at the same time many of these difficulties would have been surmounted. Again there is that question of the policy of whitewashing the authors of the raid and the suspicions it aroused in the mind of the Boers. It seems to me, however, that the main fault of the policy lay first of all in 1896, and in the following years, when you did not press home the separate treatment of the Rand; and in the second place that in 1899 you concentrated public attention on the least important point. I pass now for a few moments from the question of policy to the question of administration. With regard to administration, assuming that the war was inevitable, probable, or even possible, it was clearly within the competence, and was part of the duty of the Government to use every means in their power to obtain the most accurate information. Upon this point there was a divergence of opinion between what was said last night by the right hon. Gentleman in this House and what was said by Lord Salisbury. The First Lord of the Treasury asserted that the Intelligence Department was not to blame.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With regard to guns and men, we have not full information now, and shall not have until the war is concluded. But nothing has occurred which convinces me that the information given by the Intelligence Department on the subject of the guns was erroneous.

*MR. STEVENSON: Then there must have been a long interval in the dispatch of such information and its reaching the Government, or there must have been some leakage on the way. Lord Salisbury took quite a different line last night. If the Intelligence Department furnished the information, how is it that it was not within the cognizance of the Cabinet itself? Lord Salisbury did not give that full credit to the Intelligence Department which the right hon. Gentleman gives. He complains of the secret service and apparently threw some blame on the Chancellor of the Exchequer; because, apparently, there was not enough money for secret service. He said that if Parliament would grant sufficient money for secret service, that secret service would be efficient. Now, I say, that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had come down to the House and asked for an additional sum for secret service the House would have gladly, aye, enthusiastically voted it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (SIR M. HICKS-BEACH, Bristol, W.): It would not be for me to make any such proposal except at the instance of the Cabinet.

*MR. STEVENSON: It seems to me to be a game of battledore and shuttlecock. Lord Salisbury attributed the deficiency to the secret service fund——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is now discussing a debate in the House of Lords in the present session, and that he cannot do.

*MR. STEVENSON: Then I will confine myself to the Leader of the House and the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and with reference to the remark made just now by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it seems to me the blame attaches to the Cabinet. If the secret service was insufficiently provided with funds, and if he had to ask the Cabinet for more money to make the secret service efficient, surely the Chancellor of the Exchequer means that it was the Government who ought to deal with the matter. If that be so it becomes a point between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Cabinet as a whole. Perhaps the point in itself, as a personal one, is not of much importance; but from a national point of view it is important that the country should feel that when exigencies of this kind arise there should be no question whether this or that Minister is responsible for the due discharge of what is obviously a national duty, but that the Cabinet as a whole should take upon itself the responsibility of seeing that the safety of the Empire was not impaired. I will not mention Lord Salisbury's utterance again, Sir, under your ruling; but the difference between the two points of view is important. In one case it appears that if the Intelligence Department communicated the information to the Cabinet, in which case it does not appear to have reached them, it was not acted upon. In the other case there seems to be something wrong with the machinery, and if that be so it ought to be rectified at once. I think it was said last night by a speaker whom I am not allowed to name that "you cannot see through a brick wall." Yet we can see through a brick wall if there is a chink in it, and in this case there is a chink in it, because there is the secret service and the Intelligence Department. I can imagine the speaker in question saying, in the words of Pyramus,

Curst be thy stones for thus deceiving me."

But I am sure the people of this country will not be satisfied with excuses of that kind; they will desire that a full inquiry should be made either into the lack of efficiency on the part of the Intelligence Department or, what is perhaps more important, as to why it was that the information obtained by that department did not reach the Cabinet, or if it reached the Cabinet why it was not acted upon in proper time. Let me say one or two words more with regard to the question of administration. "Administration during the years that preceded the war" means not only military preparations, but also diplomatic preparations. I have already said a few words with regard to the possible diplomatic preparations, which might have consisted in educating public opinion in Europe upon this question. But there are other questions which must be raised in this connection. For instance, we know there was an agreement with Germany the exact nature of which has not yet been made fully public. We know, however, that in that agreement there were some very important concessions made to Germany by England. Surely the House is entitled to know whether we got in return adequate value for these concessions, and why it is that under the circumstances of that agreement it has still been open for the very unfortunate incidents to occur which have occurred in South Africa. It will certainly occur to the "man in the street"—although it is not a point which I am inclined to labour—to ask why it is that during all these years the question of

Second Day.

Delagoa Bay has been allowed to go on without any definite attempt being made to arrive at a proper solution of the question. I feel, therefore, that the question of policy and the question of administration each come within the purview of this Amendment. If ever there were grounds urged in support of an Amendment showing most clearly that there has been a lack of foresight, forethought, and knowledge, it is in this particular case. At the same time the House will echo and re-echo the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition that we must see this thing through, and, beyond all, that the Imperial authority must be supreme in South Africa. I must refer to the little duel which took place across the table yesterday, when the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House challenged the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition upon this point. The Leader of the Opposition had spoken of the necessity of preserving the integrity of the British dominions in South Africa, and of bringing this war to a successful issue. He had also said that it was necessary that the Imperial authority be supreme in South Africa. Yet in the face of that threefold declaration the Leader of the House resorted to the old and very familiar device of attempting to ascribe to another controversialist opinions which that controversialist has not held, but which had been expressed incidentally in the course of the conversation. The object of the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly clear. His object was to divert attention from his own lack of declaration and from the silence which he had pursued with regard to this very important subject. As far as I can recollect, looking back upon the speeches of the last few weeks, the only really significant declaration that has been made as to the conclusion of the war has been that by the Prime Minister in the speech which gave rise to some correspondence, and in which he said: "We seek no goldfields: we seek no territories." That was a negative and not a positive declaration, and the country as a whole is still absolutely at a loss to know what is the minimum with which the Government will be satisfied at the close of the war.

*MR. SPEAKER: I would point out to the hon. Member that the question of upon what terms the war should be concluded does not arise on this Amendment; the Amendment does not deal with anything of that kind.

*MR. STEVENSON: I was referring to the debate which had taken place yesterday before this Amendment was moved—

*MR. SPEAKER: The speeches of the right hon. Gentlemen the Leaders of the House and of the Opposition were made upon the main question, and before the Amendment had been proposed to the House.

*MR. STEVENSON: Well, Sir, I will not pursue that subject any further. I will simply point out that during the past few months there has been no definite or adequate declaration of policy on the part of Her Majesty's Government, and that this House and the country are entitled to have such a declaration. I trust that, if not in the course of the debate on this Amendment, at all events during the next few days, an opportunity will be afforded for a declaration of that character. In the meantime the Government may be assured that, certainly as far as the spirit of the country is concerned, and as far as the spirit of this House as a whole is concerned, there will be no hesitation whatever in giving to the conduct of the campaign that amount of support which may be thought necessary. We are all anxious that this war should be brought to a conclusion, and to a successful conclusion; at the same time we cannot but deeply regret and deplore the errors and vacillation of the last few years, and especially the tone and spirit in which the criticisms have been met, while we most deeply deplore that no adequate guarantee has been given that those errors and that vacillation will not be allowed to continue.

*COLONEL MILWARD (Warwickshire, Stratford-on-Avon): I am sure we shall all agree in uttering a word of deep sympathy with those who suffer from this war, and especially with those ladies whose husbands and those fathers whose sons are shut up in Ladysmith. There is no one for whom greater sympathy is felt than the noble and tender-hearted Lady who rules these realms, and no sorrow which is greater than that in which we sympathise with her, that she should have lost so many of her gallant subjects, and that the closing years of her reign should be marred by this war. I will now proceed with the Amendment before the House. I am reminded of the words spoken yesterday by a very well-known and witty Member who sits on the other side of the House; he said that the Amendment was to be so drawn that they could all vote for it, and therefore there would have to be very little in it. I complain of just the contrary—that there is a very great deal in it. It appears to me to be an Amendment by compartments. I do not think any of the Opposition accept the whole of the Amendment. Some accept one part and some accept another. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition whether he is prepared to vote for the Amendment as a whole, whether he is prepared to blame the Government for not having made greater preparations for the war? I can only say that if there was one person more than another who stayed the hand of the Government in preparing for the war, it was the Leader of the Opposition. The right hon. Gentleman repeated yesterday the words he had spoken and which he had reiterated during the most crucial months of the negotiations. On the 19th June the Leader of the Opposition said—

Not content with that, the right hon. Gentleman in the City on the 30th June said he had been very much misrepresented in the newspapers, that they had published only garbled accounts of what he had said, and he therefore repeated once more and in exactly the same words that there was nothing whatever to justify military preparation.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): That there was “nothing in what had occurred,” not that there was “nothing on the face of the earth.” I was speaking of the negotiations, of the whole course of the story with which we are dealing. That is what I repeated last night, that there was nothing in the whole story of the controversy about the franchise and the Uitlanders’ grievances in which any ingenuity of man could find a sufficient casus belli. That is what I said, and that is what I repeat.

*COLONEL MILWARD: It was not the casus belli, but the preparation for the war to which the right hon. Gentleman referred. A month later, on the 28th July, he said—

“As to war itself, a direct preparation for hostilities, I must only repeat here what I have said elsewhere, that from the beginning of this story to the end of it I can see nothing whatever which furnishes a case for armed intervention, and least of all during the recent days or weeks when we are evidently approaching, if circumstances continue favourable, a solution of the question.”

What I say is that the right hon. Gentleman, who holds a most important and a most influential position in the country—and while I have the greatest respect for the right hon. Gentleman personally, I have an even greater respect for the position which he holds—a position in the House of Commons second only to that of the Leader of the House—by his great influence and the influence of the party behind him, stayed the hands of the Government by saying again and again that there was no case even for preparation for war. There are other Members on that side of the House who have spoken in similar terms. I should like to refer especially to the hon. Member for Leigh, in Lancashire. He is well known to be the editor of one of the most influential newspapers in the North of England, and he is a gentleman who must have the very best information about every subject upon which he speaks. He has spoken here as the exponent—I do not cast any reflection on his patriotism, but I may say he has spoken for the Boers, and he has spoken as one having the most intimate knowledge of the Boers. He says—

“It makes me blush with shame when I see a great historic party like that opposite capable of the despicable meanness of seeking on such grounds to go to war against a poor little State containing 30,000 farmers. I do not believe that the people of this country, when once this matter has been fairly placed before them, will tolerate the oppression of a little State of this kind, which we hold in the hollow of our hand, for any reason such as has been assigned in the course of this debate.”

I say that this tended to paralyse the Government in their preparation for the war. Here was a gentleman who perhaps knew more about the matter than any other gentleman in the House, and he speaks of the Transvaal as "a little State containing 30,000 farmers which we hold in the hollow of our hand." Events have proved that we did not hold them in the hollow of our hand at all. What were the preparations made? The Under Secretary of State for War on the 21st October said that against the "little State of 30,000 farmers" we had already sent 25,000 regulars from this country, and there was a further despatch of 48,000 men, making 73,000 regulars against 30,000 poor farmers. I think it can scarcely be said after this that an Amendment which states that the Government made no preparation is an Amendment which can hold water. Outside this House the question which has been most debated is the question of the guns, and I should like to say a word upon that subject. There exists in this House a Committee drawn from both sides of the House, called the "Committee of Service Members"; and that Committee has the great advantage of having for its advisers the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean and the hon. Member for West Belfast. I think it will be admitted that nobody knows more of foreign arms than those two Members. The question brought up by the Member for the Forest of Dean has not been that which is now exciting the public mind, but the question of quick-firing guns.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): And of the number of guns.

*COLONEL MILWARD: The right hon. Gentleman said in 1898 that France had had quick-firing guns for eight or nine years; but I pass by this view of the question, as we are only responsible for three of those years. I admit that the subject of quick-firing guns has been raised, and that the War Office may probably have been to blame for not having pushed forward more rapidly this question. With reference to guns there appears to be not more than five advantages which you can derive from artillery. The first is range; the second, mobility; the third, the ammunition used; the fourth, the handling of the guns; and the fifth, quickness of firing. In the whole of the discussion which has taken place with regard to the range it has been contended that the Transvaal have guns of greater range, but I submit that it is only on that point that their guns are better than ours. With reference to mobility it is true the Boers move their guns to the top of kopjes where they remain, but we can move our guns from place to place. Again it has never been disputed that our lyddite ammunition has given us the greatest advantage over the Boers, and we have been told over and over again that our guns have silenced the Boer guns. Admitting that the Boers have the advantage of range, quickness of firing is equal on both sides, and we have the advantage in mobility, in ammunition, and also in the handling of the guns. So that the accusation of want of preparation for war as far as the guns are concerned is not sustained. Quickness of firing depends on the machinery and apparatus to bring the gun back to the original position from which it was fired, and when I went down last year to Woolwich with a party of Members organised by the Member for West Belfast, to see these quick-firing guns, those who saw them admired them very much and returned satisfied. I am perfectly willing to admit that an inquiry should be made and that there are things which require remedying in the War Office. The most serious thing I think is the system of promotion among officers, which is supposed to depend upon seniority tempered with competency, but it is, I am afraid, very often tempered with private influence. I am perfectly certain that men have to retire who are perfectly competent, and that others who are not competent are advanced. That is one of the points upon which I lay stress which should be considered in regard to our Army. May I now turn for a moment to the other part of the Amendment now before the House with reference to the negotiations preceding the war? I wish to say that, as far as I am concerned, my opinion is that this war was inevitable from the first. There has been growing up for the last twenty years antagonism between the Boers and the Uitlanders, and it was inevitable that war must sooner or later take place. The war between France and Germany was the result of antagonism which had been growing up year by year, and the war in South Africa is in exactly the same position. In the debate upon the negotiations on the 28th of July last a vote of censure was moved upon the Colonial Office Estimate, but it was never put, because the House was then satisfied with the explanation given by the Colonial Secretary, who proposed that there should be a joint commission of inquiry as to the franchise. I have carefully read all the despatches, and I ask every other Member of the House to read them very carefully, and if they do they will see that the Boers accepted nothing after that date, and everything we proposed they met by counter propositions which made it perfectly evident that they did not intend to accept anything, and that they had made up their minds that we should have war. If the Boers were going to invade England and they had possession of the Channel Islands, do you think that we should wait until they had landed 70,000 men in those islands before we declared war? It is clear that the Boers had made up their minds that there would be war, and they chose their own time. Then there is the opinion of the Colonials upon this subject. We have to consider not only the feelings of this country, but we must also look to the feelings of those Colonials who are face to face with the Boers. I should like to read to the House an extract from a letter which I received in July last, from Natal. It is as follows—

“These last few days the whole of British South Africa has been on the verge of rebellion against the British Government on account of a statement in The Times that it had been decided by the British Government to accept Kruger's seven years franchise proposal as a settlement. If the Government shall accept any form of compromise which does not carry into effect the irreducible minimum of Milner's Bloemfontein proposal, they must lose all support in South Africa, and every Britisher in the country would forswear allegiance to Britain. People at home cannot grasp the depth of feeling in this country. If Britain does not this time obtain for us just rights, equal rights, in the Transvaal, she loses the sympathy of every man here. We would rather a thousand times see war, even those who have much to lose, than any unguaranteed reforms without absolutely equal rights. We want the franchise in the Transvaal. We want redistribution and a certain control over the finances of the country, but above all we want the right to carry arms and to express our opinions with freedom. No settlement which does not include these, and the dismantling of the Johannesburg fort at least, can be considered a true settlement. For my own part I believe that if we do not fight now we are only postponing the inevitable by two or three years, and the inevitable when it comes will be far more serious than it would be now, for it will mean a racial war throughout South Africa. Chamberlain we trust, and Milner we doubly trust, but there are, I fear, other influences and other counsels at work that may outweigh Chamberlain's and Milner's.”

The House will recognise the fact that these Colonials are men who are bound to us in every tie of race and friendship, and they entertain a very strong feeling with regard to this war. I ask myself what the Opposition hope to gain by the Amendment now before the House? Do they hope to unite themselves and to turn out the Government? We must remember that this is practically a vote of censure, and if it were largely supported on this side of the House it would turn out the Government. I do not think that the Opposition hope to unite themselves upon this Amendment. There are some who will vote for it on one particular ground and some on another ground. The Member for South Shields, who made one of the best defences of the Government I have yet heard, will only vote for this Amendment on one ground. In view of these feelings one can scarcely imagine that the Amendment will be carried, but I fear no appeal from hon. Members on our side would be of any weight with gentlemen opposite. What we wish to have from the Opposition is criticism which will stiffen rather than weaken the Government. We have before us now one of the gravest crises of modern history. It is said that every cloud has a silver lining, and I am sure that everyone, whether he sits on that side of the House or on this, wishes to strengthen the Government, in order that we may put our whole force and strength into this war, so that there will be no drawing back until we have established what after all is our great aim, and that is that peace should reign over the whole of South Africa.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The accusation against the Government contained in this Amendment is that of want of judgment and foresight, which has not only resulted in war but has placed the country in the military position it unfortunately occupies at the present moment. In my opinion it is rather difficult for the supporters of the Government to resist this Amendment in the form in which it is drawn, because the Leader of the House practically admitted that the Government had had insufficient knowledge of the situation, and had underestimated the strength of the forces with which the country has now to contend. The right hon. Gentleman admitted also that the Government had shown some lack of foresight, because he himself admitted that it was a surprise to him that the Orange Free State had joined the Boers in warfare. I will endeavour to show that the Government were also wanting in judgment, but first of all I am bound to say that if this vote of censure had not been moved before it would be our duty to move it now after the speeches delivered yesterday in this House and in another place. It has been said that we speak with two voices. That is of little moment where the Opposition is concerned; but it is a very serious matter indeed when the Leader of the House here, and the Prime Minister in another place, speak with two voices on such an important matter as the military preparations of the Boers, and I think those two speeches would in themselves be a perfect justification of the course we have taken in moving the vote of censure. I think the speech of the Prime Minister must have come as a rude shock to Members of this House who had listened to the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury. The right hon. Gentleman is a member of the Committee of Defence, the Prime Minister is another member, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer a third. We heard in this House yesterday that the Intelligence Department and the War Office knew every single thing with regard to the Boer forces and armaments, except as regards the actual number likely to go into the field, which was naturally uncertain and impossible to estimate. That was the statement made in this House, whereas in another place the Prime Minister practically stated that it was impossible for the Intelligence Department to acquire this knowledge, because the Government had not at their disposal a sufficient amount of secret service money. I do not know who is right, but I think it is an extraordinary position that two members of the Defence Committee of the Cabinet should have given such diametrically opposite accounts of this matter. Further, the Prime Minister went on to say practically in so many words, although he personally exonerated the Chancellor of the Exchequer by name, that the disasters which occurred were due to the action of the Treasury in hampering the military preparations.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: I really must correct the hon. Member. The Prime Minister never made any such statement. He made a general statement of his opinions with regard to the Treasury. After what has been stated in various places, and after the interpretation which might be, most erroneously, placed upon that statement, it is necessary for me to say, I think, that from the very beginning of this matter neither the Treasury nor the Chancellor of the Exchequer have in any way stinted any preparations — any expenditure which was thought necessary by the Cabinet with regard to this war. All these statements with regard to myself are absolutely untrue.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I am very glad indeed, if he will allow me to say so, that I have drawn that remark from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I, for one, never believed these scandalous assertions and insinuations against which the right hon. Gentleman has protested. What I was pointing out to the House was that the Prime Minister in another place did say, in so many words, that the Treasury had the power of the purse. His words, in describing the position of the Treasury, were—

"It is the power of the purse; and by exercising the power of the purse it claims a voice in all decisions of administrative authority and policy. I think that much delay and many doubtful resolutions have been the result of the peculiar position which, through many generations, the Treasury has occupied."

He was speaking at the moment with regard to our knowledge.

*MR SPEAKER: The hon. Member will not be in order if he proceeds to discuss a debate which took place in the other House.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I was only endeavouring to show, Mr. Speaker, that I think we are entitled to blame the Government, and to move a vote of censure on them, when we find them speaking in different voices on these matters. I think also we are entitled to move this vote of censure—though I am afraid we will not succeed in carrying it—because in this workaday world we must judge a Government by results, and this Government have admitted that every calculation they made has been falsified by results. They cannot deny that their professed peace policy has resulted in war; they cannot deny that the result of their professed policy of working in friendship and accord with our Dutch fellow-citizens is that the Cape Chamber is hostile to us and the Orange Free State is ranged against us; and they cannot deny that the inadequate preparation made by them for the war has led to the humiliating position in which this country now finds itself—a position in which, in the history of the world, it has never been before, namely, having its territory occupied for nearly four months by the enemy. The worst of it is that all these evils and dangers were anticipated and foreseen and stated in this House by the right hon. Gentleman primarily responsible for them. He foretold the result and denounced the very policy which the Government finally decided to enter upon. I think we may fairly say that in moving this vote of censure we have no desire to hamper the Government in the prosecution of the war. We have full faith and the utmost confidence in the men at the wheel, but the men at the wheel are not the present holders of office, but Lord Roberts and Sir Redvers Buller. I for one am prepared to give every possible support in order to bring the war to a satisfactory conclusion. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House last night endeavoured, I think, to place the Opposition in a false light with regard to this matter. He tried to show that what my right hon. friend intended in his speech was that a satisfactory conclusion would be arrived at when the enemy were driven out of British territory, but speaking for myself, and I believe also for nearly every hon. Member on this side of the House, I go further than that. I am prepared to support the conduct of the war until the Boers shall sue for peace. I do not go so far as to say that it may not be necessary even at this moment to carry our forces further for military reasons. I do not think, however, it is advantageous to discuss terms of settlement at the present moment, and I think it was a pity that the right hon. Gentleman should have so emphatically expressed his views as to what the final settlement should be, because it is not as we should have hoped, and it may tend to hamper the conduct of the war by strengthening the backs of the enemy against suing for peace at all. The right hon. Gentleman, in a somewhat ill-advised speech which he delivered at Manchester, said that there was one advantage gained by the Government not having approached Parliament last summer for a vote of credit to resist Boer invasion, and that was that they had obtained unanimous feeling throughout the country in favour of the operations now in progress. I think, however, that the violent terms in which the right hon. Gentleman spoke last night regarding the final settlement will deter some hon. Members on this side of the House from giving that active support to the Government which they otherwise would. It is not fair to the Opposition to ask them to commit themselves at the present moment to any particular settlement of this great question. When the time to make a settlement arrives then we shall be able to discuss the best way to effect it, and I, therefore, regret that part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. The Amendment now before the House practically covers the whole ground of the policy of the Government for the last five years. The right hon. Gentleman said last night that if we were going to criticise that policy on the present occasion, we ought to have criticised it before in detail from time to time as matters occurred. We had, however, very good reason for not doing that, because we believed that step by step, until the last ill-omened step, the policy of the Government with reference to South Africa and the Transvaal was practically the same in desire and intention as that which actuated their predecessors. The policy of the Colonial Office up to recently had always been to maintain the supremacy of British rule in South Africa, to maintain the Convention of London, both in spirit and in letter, and as far as possible, by friendly negotiations, to redress the grievances from which the foreign element in the Transvaal suffered. The Colonial Office policy had been, and we believed the policy of the present Government also was, to act in accord with Dutch feeling at the Cape, and as far as possible with the friendly assistance of the progressive Boers in the Transvaal itself. Certainly there was a very large element of progressive Boer feeling in the Transvaal as well as a large element of Afrikaner feeling outside it in favour of redressing the grievances of the Uitlanders, and of getting rid of the difficulties between the Transvaal and the British Government. I am not going to deny for a moment that the South African problem had not been very troublesome. If it had been anticipated when the retrocession of the Transvaal were granted that the country would subsequently become of such importance, and that its Government would not give liberty and equality, it is certain that the retrocession would never have taken place. But it is very easy to judge after the event, as the right hon. Gentleman himself said last night. I am bound to say that though the Transvaal is a very troublesome neighbour, and they have endeavoured to extend their borders, and to obtain greater freedom or independence, I do not think that on that account we can blame them. They have their Imperialists and Expansionists in the Transvaal as we have here, and we cannot blame them for endeavouring to secure greater independence than they obtained under the Conventions. But the policy of previous Governments had been to check and restrain this evolution on the part of the Transvaal, and up to the last few years that policy has been successful, while at the same time retaining friendly relations with the Republic. That was the policy of 1895 and of Mr. Rhodes, who up to that date had showed himself a great South African statesman. His policy had been to bind the Dutch and the English element together, and in that he had been most successful. But in 1895 we had a change of Government, and at the Colonial Office a Minister who had great ideas of colonial administration. Mr. Rhodes and those working with him gauged this view pretty accurately, and thought they could force the pace. Almost directly after the Government came into office Mr. Rhodes obtained that strip of territory for the Chartered Company which formed the jumping-off place for the raid. If we had remained in office the raid would not have occurred, for if Mr. Rhodes had approached us as to the cession of Bechuanaland—although it was obvious that at some time or other it might have to be handed over to the Chartered Company—we would have said that the moment was inappropriate for so doing. First of all, only lately a new form of administration had been conferred on the Chartered Company, and we wanted to see it working better. In the second place, the pecuniary position of the Chartered Company was not such at that time as to enable it to take over further territory. I admit that the present Colonial Secretary was entirely entitled to make a different arrangement, but I say, if we had been in office the raid would not have occurred. The most disastrous effect of the raid was not that it induced the Transvaal to arm, but that it placed the Afrikaner section in the Cape in a position of antagonism and suspicion to Her Majesty's Government. The first steps taken by the Colonial Secretary after the raid were proper and right, but then we come to what I believe to be, to a large extent, the foundation of all subsequent difficulties—namely, the introduction of the system of what has been called the new diplomacy in dealing with this very delicate and ticklish question. The first mistake of all was the publication by the Colonial Secretary of a Government despatch in the beginning of 1896. Here was a case of interference by the Home Government in internal affairs of the Transvaal, and if that were to be done, it should have been with the greatest possible diplomacy and delicacy. But instead of this despatch being sent out to the High Commissioner as a basis for negotiation, conference, and discussion, it was actually published in England before President Kruger had received it at all, and the Colonial Secretary himself had to telegraph out to President Kruger, asking him to keep an open mind till he had seen the despatch itself. That was very largely the beginning of all the subsequent difficulties, and certainly was the primary cause of the abandonment by President Kruger of his intention to come over to England, and have personal conference with the Colonial Secretary. Then unfortunately came the Cape inquiry into the raid, in which the late Prime Minister of the Cape was personally implicated. Next came the unfortunate inquiry here, in which a large amount of suspicion was involved and the idea created that there had been concealment of something that might have come out. At all events, there was clearly felt, on the part of the Transvaal Government and those interested in the Transvaal, from that moment a suspicion that the Colonial Secretary and the Government were personally implicated in the proceedings of the raid. Then came the most unfortunate whitewashing of the prime mover of the raid. I have never been able to understand how that came about, because, only a few days before, the Colonial Secretary himself had put his signature to the Report which had absolutely condemned the raid. I am one of those who think that Mr. Rhodes has done a great service to the Empire, but it was not the business of the Colonial Secretary to come down to the House and give Mr. Rhodes the glowing character he did. That most unfortunately absolutely confirmed President Kruger and others in the suspicion that the Colonial Secretary was mixed up with Mr. Rhodes in the raid. Now we come to the period of nagging and sneering despatches and speeches, all which tended to confirm suspicion and irritate the Transvaal Government. I am not going to enter into the question of suzerainty; but I believe, and I think every one in this House believes, that it was most unfortunate that the Colonial Secretary should have, for the first time since 1884, raised in a public despatch the question of suzerainty. That it was wrong to do so is confirmed from his own confession in a despatch at the end of the correspondence, in which he said, "Oh, well, I have said my say, and I won't say any more about it." He did all the irritating by raising the point, and yet did not enforce it in the end. Meanwhile, from the moment that the first Drifts question was raised, the Transvaal Government had begun to arm. I am not going to defend the policy the Transvaal carried out in regard to this country; they were very foolish, and very suspicious without any real or proper occasion. I do not say, after all, that in their position they were unnaturally suspicious, but so far as I know they had really no ground for the suspicion that this country intended to interfere with their independence. I think that their policy ever since the time of the raid has been most foolish, because if they had only taken a sensible and liberal line they would by this time have been in a very strong position, and by making certain concessions they would have placed further agitation in the wrong, instead of largely in the right. All this while the Transvaal were arming. I do not know that it may not be perfectly true that being armed for one purpose, they may have got into their minds that they might use their arms for another purpose in the end. But this was known—the Government themselves say that they knew it—first, that the Transvaal were arming, and second that they might turn their arms against us. The First Lord of the Treasury said that although they knew this, the mouth of the Government was closed in consequence of the raid itself. It appears to me if that were so, the Government had two courses open to them. They might have gone to the Transvaal Government and said, "We give you formal guarantees for absolute independence; why, then, are you making armed preparations which are far beyond what you really require for police and defensive purposes, and can only be intended to be directed against us, and we must request you to cease this perpetual arming on your part." That would have been a policy perfectly clear. The other policy which, in my opinion, the Government ought to have carried out was to remove the suspicion of the Transvaal Government that we had any intention of interfering with their independence, and to show a way by which the Transvaal Government might be able to tell their burghers that it was not necessary to arm against the British Government. They adopted neither of these two policies. They carried on the policy of nagging and suspicion, which—I will not say in the minds of other people, but in the minds of the Transvaal Government—justified them in continuing arming. They started a new policy, the policy of franchise. I do not say that that was wrong, because if you are going to deal with the Uitlanders' grievances that is the best way of doing it, but it was a new policy, because when the question first arose in 1890 there was no expostulation by the Government on that matter. It is true that in 1894 the Government of which I was a member suggested presenting a despatch to President Kruger, but the right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that that despatch was never presented. It was only to be presented under certain conditions. In 1896 the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary dealt with this despatch, and upon it based his policy of Home Rule for the Rand, but in 1896 he did not put the franchise first, but only as a subsidiary matter, and even so late as last March he again referred to Local Government for the Rand, and said if that was agreed to nine-tenths of the grievances of the Uitlanders would be met. But he went on to say that it was neither dignified nor convenient to move at that moment. Therefore, I say, the policy of franchise was a new policy. Naturally, President Kruger did not intend or desire to give more than he was obliged to, and he wished to give it as slowly as possible. For a long time the Boer resistance was partly successful, but we must remember that unfortunately the two parties were looking at the matter from entirely different points of view. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the conference at Bloemfontein as a guarantee against foreign intervention, but President Kruger considered that the independence of the Transvaal was in the scale, and that the interests of the oligarchical sect of which he was one of the members were in jeopardy, and no doubt he could not help feeling that although the new policy was not annexation in form, it was annexation in fact; and he felt that if Uitlanders were admitted to the franchise in large numbers at once that would be the result. I do not intend to go into the intricate question of the policy of last year. It seems to me there were great misinterpretations on both sides. Those who have studied the Blue Books carefully cannot fail to feel this. The Colonial Secretary and those with him did not understand one another or the Boer temper, and it is largely due to that fact that the war occurred. I am not going to blame one side and not the other. I think the Boer Government are enormously to blame in the way in which they approached this question, but when the right hon. Gentleman talked of the war as inevitable, I want to know what was in the mind of the Government. The First Lord of the Treasury said it was inevitable in July and others put the date back to the Conference at Bloemfontein. I want the Government to say whether in their opinion President Stein of the Orange Free State really at that time intended that the Conference should lead to failure and lead to war, and whether President Kruger was also of the opinion, and whether, when it was going on, you could say the war was inevitable, so that you could put it plainly to the Transvaal Government that they did not intend to perform what they promised, and so absolutely convict them of good faith. We have heard of the Afrikaner conspiracy, but I think it is difficult to say that such a conspiracy existed, and, as I have studied the Blue Books, Sir Alfred Milner himself does not say there was anything like a conspiracy against British supremacy. I think the whole of this talk of an Afrikaner conspiracy has been due to the misunderstandings I have referred to. A certain number of Dutch have joined the Transvaal, no doubt, but that is largely due to the fact that we have been unable to defend our territory, and those who have joined the Transvaal have done so because they were unable to receive British protection. Under those circumstances, it was only to be expected that the Dutch in our colonies should join those of their own race and blood. I have endeavoured to prove, as shortly as possible, that the Government have shown want of judgment in regard to this matter. They have themselves admitted want of knowledge and foresight, and I think, that being so, we are fully justified in moving this vote of censure, and while we do not think there is any chance of carrying it, it will tend to stiffen the Government in their action, and we hope in the settlement that must take place at some future time the Government will take care not to give domination to one side or the other. We want liberty and equality in South Africa, but we must not forget that we must have fraternity as well.

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD (Somersetshire, Wellington) said he must apologise for being so dense as not to understand what was meant by the speeches of the party opposite. The leaders affected to be anxious to bring this war to a successful issue. There was one element of success, and that was to show a united front to the enemy; but hon. Members opposite appeared to be animated by a desire to initiate a party discussion, to be followed by a party division. He could only imagine that a long and close intimacy with the Irish party had produced that paradox. What was the object of turning out the present Government? If they did turn it out and put in their own party, how could such a Government prosecute the war to any issue but a most disastrous one? It was idle at the present moment to debate whether the war was or was not inevitable. Hon. Members seemed to forget that the country was at this moment at war, and had been at war for three months. A great portion of the Queen's dominions had been overrun and was held by foreign troops, and large portions of our dominions had been annexed. It seemed a strange thing for the House of Commons, then, to debate what happened five years ago. What we had to consider was the best means of bringing the war to a successful issue, and to proceed with the defences of our country. It must not be forgotten that a large portion of our Army was 6,000 miles away, and it was of vital importance that the home defences should be made secure as soon as possible. He thought it was, on the whole, fortunate for the Government that the two questions of whether the war was inevitable and whether we were prepared or not had been incorporated into one Amendment. For the reasons he had stated, hon. Members on his side of the House were agreed as to the utter uselessness of raking up the past policy of the Government. But as regarded the preparations for the war there were on that side of the House certain differences of opinion, and he would not be doing his duty to his constituents or to the service if he did not say a few words of criticism on the present position of affairs in South Africa. He was as strong a supporter of the Government as any man in that House or in the country. He wanted to see the Government strong both in the House and throughout the country, and he believed it would be much stronger in both places if it would take them into its confidence and tell them frankly where the mistakes had been in the past. He could not acquiesce in the doctrine that the failures had been unavoidable, or that the hereditary disposition of the British Army was to suffer reverses at the opening of a campaign. Would the Government announce what they meant to do in the future? It was admitted that we were not prepared for a war—at any rate on the scale of the one in which we had embarked. But why was that so? And who was responsible? In his humble judgment there were two principal causes for our failures. The first was our military system, and the second was the want of information both at home and in South Africa. As regarded our military system the responsibility rested not with the Government or with the War Office, but solely with the House of Commons. For years the Service Members had prophesied to empty benches what would happen in the event of a big war. Only twice could he remember any interest being taken by the House in Army questions—once when Lord Rosebery's Government was turned out of office by a very skilful move, and again when the strongest Government of modern times was nearly defeated on the question of sewage-farm milk. He knew that Service Members were considered to be bores of the largest calibre, but they had this advantage: they knew what they were talking about, and they were aware that when they were discussing an expenditure of 40 or 50 millions year after year they were dealing with a subject vital not only to the interests of this country, but to the interests of our Empire all over the world. Therefore he regarded the House of Commons as alone to blame. When he came to the question of the want of information he confessed that they were landed in somewhat of a difficulty. He did not quite understand how far the Government and the Intelligence Department had been in touch with one another. He could not help being reminded of a picture which appeared in Punch ten days previously, in which the Prime Minister was represented as saying to the Cabinet, "Well, gentlemen, never mind what we think; let us all say the same thing." Yet on the first day of the session that gun had missed fire. The First Lord had certainly told them the Intelligence Department had very accurate information as regarded the Transvaal preparations, excepting so far as the number of men was concerned. But if only the armaments of the Boers were known, how could it be supposed that the force originally despatched would be sufficient? Although it had since been multiplied threefold we were still unable to drive the enemy out of our territory and to invade the Transvaal. Then, as to the guns. Did the Intelligence Department know as long ago as last June that the Boers had large numbers of quickfiring guns and Creusots; that they had double the number of rifles necessary to arm every man in the Transvaal and the Free State; and that there were 25 millions of cartridges in Pretoria; and lots more coming over the sea? If the Department knew all these things, they must have told the Government; and if they did not know, they were grossly wanting in their duty. Again, if these facts were known in June, what could have been the objection to our sending out a number of heavy siege guns? It was not possible perhaps to send infantry and cavalry, but they might have sent heavy siege guns, for that would have been a defensive rather than an offensive measure. Would the Government give the House some information on that point? He would like further to know when did the Government receive the first intimation that Ladysmith was to be held with a large force? If that had been known only a few days before the retreat from Dundee there would have been ample time to fortify the heights round and to mount a large number of naval guns. They had been told that everything was left to the general in the field; but it was well known that when the Army applied to the Navy for guns there was always, and properly, difficulty in getting them. Naval officers did not like to strip their ships of the most valuable part of their armament. But surely the Government had supreme authority, and could have directed that the guns should have been sent up from the fleet. Had they done so, the Ladysmith garrison would have been in a much better position than at present. Then as to absence of proper maps of Natal. It might be said that it was the duty of a self-governing colony to make its own ordnance surveys. But for years it had been known that there was a probability of our having in the immediate future to fight in Natal; and if only proper maps had been available for our generals much loss of life would have been avoided. As to Kimberley and Mafeking, some information was wanted, both by the House and by the country, as to why the Cape Government refused to send arms and munitions to those towns, while all the time armaments were allowed to pass into the Transvaal. The responsibility for that should be brought home to the proper persons. Then he came to the question of the colonial troops and auxiliaries. He would like to ask, when it was stated that our generals had had a free hand, was it meant that they had been unrestricted as to the raising of colonial auxiliaries? He asked these questions not to embarrass the Government, but because the country demanded an answer to them. Unless they were answered, the country would lose confidence in the Government. He should not vote for the Amendment, because he considered it was wholly mischievous. It could do no possible good, and its adoption might cause incalculable harm. He should support the Government through thick and thin. The supporters of the Government were determined to see them through this business. They would give them any supply and make any sacrifices, whether of money or life, which might be necessary. Whatever opposition they might meet in the House or out of it, they were determined that the sword should not be laid down until the principle of equal rights for all men throughout South Africa had been established.

*MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. and gallant Member who preceded me, and with others who have said that there probably has never been a moment of more grave national peril than that we are face to face with at this juncture. Our country is denuded of almost all our defensive forces, who are engaged in a very serious, and hitherto not successful, war at the other side of the world. Our great dependency, India, is passing through a period of distress, and, as we know, the various Powers of Europe are not at all too favourably disposed towards us. I do think that we may surely draw another conclusion from the crisis than that of the hon. and gallant Member—namely, that it is our duty, as an assembly representative of the people, to censure the Ministry which has led us into these grave disasters. I put it to those who heard the hon. and gallant Member oppose this Amendment, whether, in regard to half of that Amendment, he did not make a most effective speech in support of it. Because, what is it the Amendment proposes? It expresses regret at two things: (1) at the want of foresight and judgment displayed by Her Majesty's Government in the conduct of South African affairs since 1895, and (2) as to the lack of foresight and judgment exhibited by Her Majesty's Government in the preparations made by them for the war now proceeding. We want some further explanation from the Government as to what information was in the possession of the Intelligence Department before the war, whether they communicated it to the Government, and whether that information was acted upon. The Government have confessed, by many mouths, that they hopelessly under-estimated the numbers of the Boers, their fighting powers, and their armaments. The House is entitled to know whether this gross and culpable mistake was founded on material supplied by the Intelligence Department or not. If it were so founded, then the only conclusion to come to is that the Intelligence Department sadly needs reorganisation and overhauling, and putting upon a new foundation. If that is not the fact, then I think the Intelligence Department is laid under an unmerited stigma, which, in all fairness, ought to be speedily removed. The country at large is entitled to know who is responsible for this mistake, and what was the information that was given to the Government on which they acted, or failed to act. To my mind the responsibility rests with the gentlemen who sit upon that bench; and it is their duty as English gentlemen, whether it be their own individual or collective faults, to acknowledge their error, and not to try, directly or indirectly, or by collusion, to cast it upon any department of the State. Another point brought up by the hon. and gallant Member was that of the want of maps of the territory which was now the scene of the conflict. Surely it was one of the most elementary duties of the Government—especially a Government which placed so high an estimate in its programme on the importance of national defence—to have provided for a thorough military survey of the country that for years has been looked upon as a probable theatre of war. I do not need to be told, for a single moment, that a responsible Minister of the Crown who came down to the House and asked for money for Cape Colony or Natal for such a purpose would not have got it. He would have got it at once. Then I should like a little further explanation on the question put to the First Lord of the Treasury yesterday as to Sir William Butler's reports. I am at a loss to reconcile the statement made by the First Lord of the Treasury with that of the Under Secretary of State for War. On October 20th last the Under Secretary of State for War stated in the House that representations urging the necessity of increasing the garrison in South Africa had been received previous to June 27th from the High Commissioner, the Governor of Natal, and the officer commanding the troops in South Africa, who at that time was Sir William Butler. It is perfectly clear from the statement of the Under Secretary last October that there were official dispatches from Sir W. Butler advocating the sending out of increased forces for the defence of our South African Colonies. Now, the First Lord of the Treasury undoubtedly stated last night—I have not yet been able to verify it in The Times—that no report had been received by any public department in this country, either by the Colonial Office or the War Office, from Sir William Butler, advocating the increase of the garrison.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): No, no!

*MR. BUCHANAN: Then the Attorney General knows more about it. This just shows the ambiguity in which the House is on this question, and how desirable it is for the House and for the country to have fuller and more complete information on this point. Surely we have a right to expect it, and that the position of two such persons in high places as the High Commissioner and the Governor of Natal should be made plain. I also think that more information should be vouchsafed as to the steps the Government are taking for retrieving the disastrous position into which they have brought us in South Africa. We have not heard in this House, nor in the other House, nor in the Queen's Speech—which is barren to a degree—what measures the Government propose to take; and there is not a single one among the half-dozen Bills of which notice has been given on behalf of the Government which deals with the question of naval or military defence. There is a very natural anxiety prevailing that some statement should be made by some responsible authority, on behalf of the Government, of the steps they propose to take; and whether it involves large expenditure or not, I can honestly affirm that it will be cordially supported by hon. Members on both sides of this House. The hon. and gallant Member who preceded me objected to this Amendment on several grounds. I do not know that it is necessary for me to go into the points he makes, as there are many other speakers who desire to join in this debate. I would rather proceed to the reasons why I am fully prepared to support the Amendment. The Amendment contains two distinct parts. It expresses want of confidence in the Government for the lack of preparation for this serious war, and it expresses want of confidence in the Government also for the way in which they have conducted South African affairs from the time they came into office down to the present moment. With regard to the want of preparation the facts speak for themselves. The Government have themselves confessed it over and over and over again. There is not an individual who sits upon the front bench opposite who has made a public speech within the last two months who has not been obliged to stand in a white sheet and confess that the Government entirely misapprehended the strength of the Transvaal, and that through their own culpable ignorance we have been involved in these very serious disasters. I do not say that all these distinguished gentlemen give the same reasons for the mistakes. Far from it. We get a great variety of reasons. We had the reasons given by the First Lord of the Treasury, and they were examined into by my right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition. We had other reasons given by the Prime Minister. We had a reason, by the way, given by the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who was formerly Under Secretary of State for War. His reason, I am bound to state, is the most extraordinary of all, for he told us only a few days ago that at any rate, if the Government had committed any errors, they were errors of the head but not of the heart. Surely it is preposterous for the right hon. Gentleman to get up and trifle with an audience by saying, when the nation has had to suffer military and political humiliations such as it has not endured during the century, that after all the hearts of Her Majesty's Ministers are in the right place. The country does not pay them for that. The country pays them for exercising a little of the ordinary intelligence that it would expect to get from any dozen or two dozen Members selected from among Members of this House. Then there is the excuse given by the Secretary of State for War, which is rather a novel one. He told us that our war preparations were in an admirable state, but they were not preparations for war on the spot. Apparently they were preparations for war in general, but not for war in the Transvaal or South Africa. He might be justified in saying that the way in which the War Office were enabled to despatch an army corps to South Africa was worthy of credit, but it is no excuse for the failure of the Government to anticipate the greatness of the struggle in which we are being engaged for the noble Lord to say that our war preparations were in excellent order, but they were not in excellent order in the one place where war was likely to occur. Then we have had the excuses of the Prime Minister with regard to secret service money. "Information was merely a question of money," he said; "you do not give me enough secret service money." The Prime Minister has often shown that his ideas of government in this country are not those held by the bulk of the people of the country or by the bulk of hon. Gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House, but he has been long enough in public affairs to know that he must work with the machine he has got. He knows perfectly well that if the responsible Minister had asked for more money for that purpose he would have got it without a word of comment or a moment of delay. The noble Marquess, also, like the First Lord of the Treasury, blamed the poor unfortunate British Constitution, because, forsooth, there were impediments in the way of a single individual Minister spending what he likes and doing as he likes without calling Parliament together or without the control of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the other officials of the Treasury. He complains of that, and says that if it had not been for that everything would have been well. This is, of course, preposterous. The Treasury, as far as all these matters are concerned, is the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a colleague of the Prime Minister, and the responsibility for any action that might be taken by the Treasury rests with the Chancellor of the Exchequer first and with the Cabinet if they agree with him. It is mean and paltry for a man in the position of the Prime Minister to endeavour to shift the blame on to a public department which has no opportunity of replying. One word more on the second part of the Amendment. A sentence which fell from the First Lord of the Treasury last night really has amply justified all the charges that have been brought against the Government in this matter, and also the moving of this Amendment. In the course of his speech, in speaking of the negotiations which had been instituted for the doing away of the Uitlanders' grievances, the right hon. Gentleman said that if the Boer Government did not make these concessions "we"—that is, the Government—"always knew it must lead to hostilities between the two countries." Just think what that means. It means that the Government embarked in a series of negotiations with a Power which they knew was difficult to deal with—intricate negotiations with a gentleman like Mr. Kruger, who was obstinate and well skilled in all the devices of diplomacy—they embarked upon these negotiations, and they knew, and they themselves say they knew, that if the negotiations failed there would be war, and yet for that war they made no preparations, or no sufficient preparations. Just see how this interpretation of their conduct can be justified out of the mouth of the First Lord himself. It will be in the recollection of many Members here that in last October the right hon. Gentleman found fault with a speech of the Leader of the Opposition and then very graciously pointed out the sort of speech the Leader of the Opposition ought to have made. This is the speech which the First Lord of the Treasury put into the mouth of the Leader of the Opposition as a fit and proper speech—

"The Government might have hoped and were right to hope that peace might be maintained, but they had also to contemplate the possibility of peace not being maintained. It was their duty without menace to provide for the defence of the Empire. That duty they had failed to undertake, and we, the Opposition, express our unanimous condemnation of the failure to carry out the primary duty of the Government, viz., that of seeing to the safety of the Empire."

No words of mine could express more clearly or more strongly the case we have against the Government. I would rest the whole of my case as regards the second part of the Amendment upon that statement. The First Lord committed himself definitely to the knowledge that the failure of the negotiations would mean war, and he has over and over again admitted personally and through his colleagues that for that war they did not make adequate preparations. The early part of the Amendment deals with the past and with the conduct of colonial affairs—for that is what it comes to—in South Africa from 1895 to the present time. I support that part of the Amendment because I believe that the conduct of colonial affairs in South Africa from the time the present Government came into office has been clearly and directly the cause of this war and the disasters which have befallen the country. The right hon. Gentleman who has charge of colonial affairs certainly cannot plead ignorance of the affairs of South Africa. He objected last night to an opinion of his own in the year 1878 being quoted; I could quote opinions of his, both of earlier and later dates than that, from which it is clear that he had a thoroughly intimate and complete knowledge of the condition of affairs in South Africa. He has told us in former days more than once that he was one of the few who opposed the original annexation of the Transvaal; he was a member of the Cabinet that gave back the independence of the Transvaal, and he was the one member of the Cabinet who most strenuously defended both in and out of this House that course of action. There is no speech which puts more clearly the awful consequences of a war in South Africa between British and Dutch than the speech of the right hon. Gentleman at Birmingham in the summer of 1881. He knew well, and he stated it in the vigorous and clear language of which he is a master, that in case of war the Free State burghers would immediately join with the Transvaal; he was under no such delusions as were other Members sitting on that Bench; he knew the dangers and the consequences which would ensue, and yet from 1895 down to the outbreak of war he has taken hardly a single step that has not brought war nearer our doors; he has shown a recklessness and a culpableness in the conduct of affairs such as I believe is not paralleled in our time. His position was made exceedingly difficult in the earlier stages of his Ministry by the most wicked and nefarious filibustering raid of Dr. Jameson. He took immediate steps to disown that action during the early months of 1896, but what steps has he taken from the summer of 1896 onwards to do away with the evil consequences of the raid? We have had it proved over and over again by all sorts of witnesses—by witnesses who take different views from those held by myself and my friends—that the deep suspicion caused thereby not merely of the Chartered Company, but of the Imperial Government and of everything British in South Africa, was one of the rankling causes in President Kruger's mind that has led to the Transvaal armaments and the war. I could quote correspondence from The Times correspondent, Captain Younghusband, who stated in 1897 that the first and chief and only effort to be made by the British Government should be to do away as speedily as possible with the atmosphere of suspicion through which, owing to the raid, every action of the Home Government was viewed by the Transvaal and by the population of South Africa. I do not say that the Colonial Secretary has been alone in his failure in this respect; undoubtedly there are others who must bear the blame with him. The leaders of the raid—Mr. Rhodes and others—have been whitewashed by the Colonial Secretary in extravagant terms, but they have also been petted and pampered and favoured by many of the highest in the land, and by all classes of the community. It is only natural that this attitude of suspicion on the part of President Kruger should have continued towards the action of any associated in any degree with those who were to blame for the raid. The first duty of the right hon. Gentleman should have been to disabuse President Kruger of all such ideas, to clear up absolutely the remotest vestige of suspicion that there could be in any conceivable degree any complicity between the authors of the raid and the Colonial Office; and he should have proceeded by a cautious, patient, and conciliatory policy to do away with all the differences which existed. Moreover, there is no doubt that Sir Alfred Milner's direction of affairs in South Africa has not tended towards peace. I say this with the deepest regret, but it is palpable to all who read what has been and is being published, that the policy which Sir Alfred Milner has pursued has not been a policy which has tended to bring the two vast populations in South Africa together, but rather one which has tended towards racial antipathy and the stirring up of one section of the community against the other. [Cries of "No."] However, that is my opinion, and it is an opinion which is very generally felt. I will go further. So strongly is that opinion held that when the victorious issue of the war takes place I believe you will never have a permanent and satisfactory peace concluded in South Africa if Sir Alfred Milner continues to be High Commissioner and if the right hon. Gentleman continues to be Colonial Secretary. [Ministerial laughter.] It will be no laughing matter. There are difficulties of war, but there are difficulties still greater in making and concluding peace after war is over, and I believe most firmly that the retention of their present positions by those two right hon. Gentlemen will be a permanent obstacle which must be removed before such a peace can be concluded. I most cordially support both parts of the Amendment before the House. I consider that the Government have culpably failed in their duty in not making adequate preparations for this very serious war, and that they have also grossly failed in their duty by the way in which the affairs in South Africa have been conducted from 1895 onwards. Although it is improbable—impossible—that this Amendment should be carried, still I am perfectly confident that if it were carried it would be the best thing for this country and the best thing for South Africa—not because those who share my political opinions might come into power, but because I firmly believe that no disasters have ever come upon this country to parallel those which have been brought upon it by the present Government, and that you could not get a body of men, wherever selected from, who could bring greater disgrace or greater disaster upon the State.

*COLONEL BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): Most of the latter part of the speech of the hon. Member who has just spoken dealt with what are now rather old subjects of controversy. The people of the country at the present moment are chiefly interested in the events of the war, and not the causes which brought the war about. They go further, and are mainly interested in bringing the war to an honourable and satisfactory conclusion. I cannot agree with the hon. Member in thinking that the public or any body of people except the enemies of this country would hail with satisfaction a change of Government at the present time. On the other hand, it is quite possible to admit that someone should be held responsible for a considerable amount of mismanagement, and I frankly admit that the difficulty of most orators on this side of the House has hitherto been to fix this particular responsibility. The fact that we have had to strain every nerve and go to the very last of our military resources to face a struggle with a second or third rate Power is in itself a proof that we are not prepared to face any more formidable opponent, and that is a very serious national question. The Leader of the House has rather narrowed the issue lately by telling us frankly that the War Office and the Government were in possession of information from the Intelligence Department. I am one of the right hon. Gentleman's friends who were considerably disappointed with the speeches he made at Manchester a short time ago. In those speeches he appeared to be endeavouring to fasten some of the responsibility for the bad information he possessed on his friends in this House who were in the habit of criticising the War Office, and on the press. We may not have performed a very useful part; but one thing is quite certain, that in season and out of season ever since we have been in existence we have urged that our military system was thoroughly bad and needed radical reform. The right hon. Gentleman asked, when had any of us said that we possessed bad field artillery? In a certain sense no one who knew anything about the army could say we had bad field artillery; it is the one arm of which we have always had most right to be proud, both as regards the officers and men, and, for that matter, the horses. But as regards its organisation, its armament, and its numbers, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Forest of Dean has often called attention to the subject, while the hon. Member for West Belfast has done the same; while in a formal document which we all addressed to the Prime Minister in September, 1898, we used this expression—

"The horse and field artillery also have been reduced to a condition even worse than that of the line."

I might quote extensively from this letter, which was certainly acknowledged, but never, as far as I know, acted upon. We said that the position of the military forces was very unsatisfactory, and we concluded by saying that we were convinced there was no matter of greater importance to the Empire at the present moment. With regard to the abstinence of the press from criticism in this matter, it must have been news to the readers of The Times, the Morning Post, and the Pall Mall Gazette that they had not constantly urged a complete reform of our whole military system. I am therefore glad the right hon. Gentleman has helped us to get on to the right scent as to where the responsibility rests. With regard to the guns, I cannot help thinking the right hon. Gentleman was somewhat confusing field guns and guns of position. All we desired to have were guns not unequal to cope with the guns to be brought against them. I have no doubt that our guns would cope with similar guns if brought against them, but the curious position that the Intelligence Department, or rather our generals abroad, had to deal with was in having to bring field guns to fight guns of position. With regard to the matter of preparation, I confess it would have taken a very astute Intelligence Officer to know that guns of position would be found to possess so much mobility and be brought into action in the way they have been. It was no doubt an error on their part, but I think a pardonable error. There is another factor which must not be forgotten in talking about want of preparation, and that is that this is the most novel kind of warfare that history can record—I mean that magazine rifles, smokeless powder, and things of that sort are so entirely novel that it would have required absolute prescience to know what their precise effects would be. But the right hon. Gentleman has said that Sir John Ardagh and the officers under him had practically warned the Government or the War Office of all that they knew on these subjects. We come back to the question of who is responsible for the various avoidable mistakes which have been made, and not the mistakes which everybody else would have made. Here I find myself once more in the old difficulty when criticising the War Office, that there never is anyone to attack. There is a deeply rooted, chivalrous tradition in official life in this country that we should never criticise subordinate executive officials, but surely the due maintenance of this tradition must depend upon one primary condition, namely that there should be somebody else to take the responsibility in place of the subordinate official. It is the War Office alone which, of late years, has tried to maintain this tradition, and at the same time extend it to everyone within its walls. The result is that, no matter how badly matters fare with the British Army, or what scandals take place, no one is to blame and no one is held to be responsible. It is considered to be a species of blasphemy to hint that some personages connected with the War Office can make any mistakes. There is an old maxim of our constitution that the King can do no wrong, but the War Office have extended that dictum to a very inconvenient extent. Of course when we have a reformed War Office charged with the duty of administering a great Imperial Army, it will be fairer to apportion the blame when blame is called for, but under the present condition of things, when both the Army and the War Office are maintained on principles that have been exploded in every other part of the world, I agree with my hon. and gallant friend who spoke earlier in the afternoon, that we should really take a wider survey of the matter, and, to a great extent, blame ourselves. The system that has to be administered at the War Office is so hopelessly antiquated—and in many respects corrupt and thoroughly bad—that it must be almost impossible for the most gifted Minister to make anything of it; and I believe that until the people at large make the discovery that they have a personal interest in the active efficiency of the War Office as a subject that concerns them, we are not likely to have any very vigorous reforms. For much of our unpreparedness at the present time both parties in the State must be equally blamed, and in one respect in particular, and that is in regard to the training of officers in high positions. I am not sure that Indian campaigns and the experience of savage warfare is not more of a snare than an advantage to general officers finding themselves for the first time confronted with civilised opponents armed with the most modern weapons. It is quite certain there is no peace training equal to the holding of manœuvres on a large scale; and when I remember the very grudging way in which the Manœuvres Bill was introduced at all, how we had to beg Ministers to proceed with it, how it was maimed and mutilated in its passage through the House, and how after it was passed it was only put in force once, and then in a most timid and tentative manner, I say that the Government of the country and Parliament, and especially those who obstructed the Manœuvres Act, are morally to blame for much of the loss of life that has taken place in South Africa. I could prove this point by very close argument if I were to transgress a rule we should all observe, namely, not to presume to criticise the generals now in the field. I think I can prove the converse proposition, that where manœuvres have been possible the greatest advantage has accrued. The country has for some years past had cavalry manœuvres, not on a very large scale, but larger than usual. Anyone acquainted with the facts will admit that it was in these exercises that Colonel French—now General French—learned those lessons which he has put into such brilliant practice in the field. There are many other items of unpreparedness to which I might have referred, but I should like before resuming my seat to say a word on the subject of the Imperial Yeomanry. Part of our want of preparation has been in regard to mounted infantry, a new arm about which in the public mind considerable misapprehension exists. I think the decision to form this mounted infantry out of any rough-and-ready material that first presented itself, and to form a nucleus out of the rank and file of the Yeomanry was a wise one; but I consider the subsequent proceedings in raising this force of mounted infantry showed either carelessness or unacquaintance with the subject on the part of someone. I note especially the fact that nearly all the organisation and all the duties connected with the enrolment have been entrusted entirely to Yeomanry officers. The true cavalry spirit which distinguishes men like Lord Chesham, Viscount Valentia, Lord Harris, and no doubt his Grace the Duke of Marlborough is just the spirit that is not wanted for mounted infantry, and I ask my military friends who are well acquainted with this subject whether it is not true that mounted infantry is in many respects as unlike cavalry as it can possibly be? The horse in this case simply means locomotion, and the man is to become an infantry soldier when he gets to the place where he is wanted. Therefore it is a matter for serious criticism that this enrolment—by no means unconnected with a certain amount of jobbery—has been entirely entrusted to amateur cavalry officers. There have been many incidents connected with it which are not calculated to improve the spirit and increase the respect of those who have been enrolled for our military system to start with—I allude more particularly to the qualifications that have been exacted for shooting. I think it will hardly be believed that in selecting this mounted infantry for work in the war volunteers who come with certificates of marksmanship with the long rifle, which is what they will have to use against the enemy, are rejected because they fail to qualify with the short cavalry carbine. This is only one instance of the sort of blundering which takes place every day under our existing system. I know the House is anxious to hear far more important speakers, but I should like to say before sitting down that it is possible to hold the rather strong views which I have partly expressed and at the same time not agree with the Opposition in their desire to defeat the present Government. I agree with many of the premises that gentlemen opposite have brought forward, but I disagree with their main conclusion. I do not know who the particular Minister is whom they think the Queen and the country and millions of our loyal colonists would look to with any confidence at the present moment to take up the present chaotic position of affairs. There is an old proverb about swapping horses while crossing the stream, which has great application at the present time. When the war is over it will be our duty to raise a very serious discussion upon the whole of our military system. I do not know whether it is too sanguine to express the hope that, out of all this material we have seen for the first time in the Colonial troops and the Imperial Yeomanry, who have come forward with such splendid spirit, it will be possible to weld some sort of homogeneous reserve for the future. At any rate, the Secretary of State will have an unrivalled opportunity of doing something of the kind if he is a man of common sense and reasonable ambition. I believe that whatever Government are in power they will find not only that vital changes are necessary, but that the people are quite ready to take their personal share in them; and I believe that this want of preparation, which cannot be altogether denied at the present time, may prove in the end the means of our being prepared for far more serious struggles that may still be before us.

SIR R. T. REID (Dumfries Burghs): It is not my intention to follow the hon. and gallant Gentleman in his criticism of the military aspect of the present situation, although I think any man who loves his country must feel very grave misgivings in regard to our military position, and considerable regret that there does not appear to be any adequate sense in the Government of the gravity of the situation with which we are confronted. I wish to speak upon the causes of this war and its political surroundings. I believe that the Government is responsible, because of its recklessness, want of judgment, and I must also add its want of straightforwardness, for one of the most difficult positions in which this country has found itself in the course of the last hundred years. It is perfectly true that, in a military sense, this war has been brought about by the invasion of Her Majesty's dominions, and I for one do not think it possible to ask that the war should be stopped so long as enemies occupy Her Majesty's dominions. But I think we ought to recognise other causes of the war beside the proximate and immediate causes. Strategically I suppose the Boers were justified in what they did. I believe, however, that history will condemn them for taking the initiative, because so weak and absurd is the case for war between two civilised nations that if Parliament had had an opportunity of considering these grievances I do not believe that Parliament would have sanctioned the commencement of hostilities. I feel myself that it is necessary for us to speak upon these subjects. I know perfectly well that the newspaper press—part of which, I think, is very likely corrupt—after spending about three months in attacking and vilifying everyone opposed to the war, immediately before the opening of Parliament endeavoured to make out that it would be a most unpatriotic act to hold the Government responsible. If it is merely a question of submitting to the charge of want of patriotism I agree with the hon. Member for Plymouth in what he said some little time ago when The Times newspaper attacked him for being unpatriotic and cowardly. But we shall have to consider—and very soon, I trust—the question of the settlement of this terrible war with the Transvaal, and if we think that this war is an absolutely wanton, unprovoked, and vicious attempt on the part of the two Boer Republics to break down the authority of Great Britain, we should take a different view of what ought to be the settlement in that case from the view we should take if we believed, as I believe, that Her Majesty's Government are, in the ultimate sense, responsible for this war. I should be a coward if I did not state openly what I believe is the real cause of this war. The real cause of the war is a misunderstanding between two nations, fostered by the wickedness and folly of two men, and supported and made possible by the violence of the press and by the lies which the press has been circulating. So far as the inhabitants of the two South African Republics are concerned they have been for years possessed by the gravest suspicion of the intentions of Her Majesty's Government towards them. If we could penetrate what are the real innermost counsels of those who are our enemies, what do we suppose they think and believe they are fighting for to-day? The First Lord of the Treasury in one of his speeches stated that the Boers were making a bold bid for empire, and that there has been existing a conspiracy in South Africa among the Dutch of Cape Colony and the two Republics for I do not know how many years to drive the British into the sea, and thus gratify their own ambition. I should like to examine that statement if I may, and if the House will allow me I will endeavour to do so. What is the character of this ambitious scheme? The Boers are not a type of people likely to be fascinated by the glitter of military enterprise. They are not soldiers, and they number in the Transvaal about 30,000 men, mostly peasants and farmers. They consist of persons between sixteen and sixty years of age. That is not the kind of people you would expect to find possessing a great army and anxious to found an empire. We have had evidences of their friendliness even since the Jameson raid, for when we were in difficulties in Rhodesia they offered to send a commando for the purpose of assisting Her Majesty's forces. After the Jameson raid they endeavoured to prevail upon Her Majesty's Government to cancel the Charter, and place under the stronger and firmer Imperial authority the whole of the territory called Rhodesia. After the Hague Conference we ought not to forget that the Blue-books are full of the most persistent and passionate appeals for arbitration upon points of difference, appeals which cannot but have been sincere, as they were constantly repeated; and I say it is idle after that to suggest, without a fragment of evidence, that these men have been animated by an ambition to drive us out of South Africa. The Free Staters were also supposed to be parties to this newly-discovered conspiracy. They have been our friends for years, and no one has made more strenuous efforts for peace than President Steyn. Not only this, but when Mr. Reitz, who is now the State Secretary of the Transvaal, was President of the Orange Free State not many years ago, he refused to accept the presidency until he had ascertained that an Englishman—Sir George Grey—was unwilling to accept the position which would have been willingly given to him by those who are now supposed to be a conspiring State. I grant that there is considerable danger of the Colonial Dutch being driven into a conspiracy. But was there any conspiracy among them before this war broke out? In 1895 they were willing to pay one-half the cost of the war waged by this country against the Transvaal. In 1897 Sir Alfred Milner wrote a despatch upon the occasion of Her Majesty's Jubilee, in which he dwelt with emphasis upon the loyalty of the Dutch in Cape Colony as well as those of British descent, and in May, 1899, the right hon. Gentleman who is now First Lord of the Admiralty made an excellent speech, in which he pointed with legitimate pride and enthusiasm to the loyalty of the Dutch in Cape Colony, who were then in a majority, as they now are, in the Cape Parliament. I will only remind the House of the reasons which justified the First Lord of the Admiralty in making this statement seven months ago. This disloyal State made a grant of £30,000 a year in 1898 to support the Imperial Navy, and handed over Simons Bay for the benefit of Her Majesty's forces. That sounds rather an improbable preface to a tale of conspiracy. There have been many Blue-books published in reference to South Africa, and there have been many occasions on which we have had differences about South Africa. The Colonial Secretary has told us that we have been on the verge of war four times within a small number of years, but you will not find in all the Blue-books a single trace of evidence or the expression of opinion on the part of any person conversant with South Africa contending for the existence of any such design, with the solitary exception of a most unfortunate and ill-advised passage in Sir Alfred Milner's despatch of the 4th May, 1899. More than that, there has been debate after debate in this House, and speech after speech made on critical occasions relating to South Africa during the last ten or twelve years, and there has never been, that I know of, a single public speaker, responsible or irresponsible, who ever dreamt of the existence of this conspiracy until this war broke out; and even those who support the Government feel that they are not able to justify the policy which led to this war by taking refuge in this pitiable fable. It is said sometimes that the armaments of the Boers are evidence of this conspiracy. I am not going to inflict upon the House any careful calculation, and I will only tell them what the figures were for the years 1893 to 1898, in thousands, of the expenditure by the Transvaal upon their Army.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: The published figures?

SIR R. T. REID: Yes. I suppose the right hon. Gentleman knows the private figures. But what is the evidence of the private figures? Are we to be left to conjecture upon this private expenditure? I have not myself the other figures, but I will take care that they are put before the House before the debate is finished; but allow me now to put these figures before the House: In 1893 the expenditure was £17,000; in 1894, £28,000; in 1895, £87,000, and that was the year of the Drifts Question, the year of the Johannesburg revolution, and the year at the end of which was the Jameson raid. In 1896, the expenditure was £494,000; in 1897, £396,000, and in the first nine months of 1898 it was £163,000. The supposed policy of driving the British into the sea is a myth, an invention fabricated for the purpose of excusing the consequences of the fatal policy which Her Majesty's Government have pursued for the last four or five years. The Boers are fighting under the influence of one of the most powerful feelings which can animate human nature; they are fighting, as they believe, to save their country from foreign domination, and if any man wonders at their military success and their military prowess he has only to look back upon the history of Scotland, or Switzerland, or Holland, or the United States, and there he will find what is the true value of the stimulus of patriotism. My charge against the Government is, that by their policy since their advent to office they have stimulated and inflamed the alarm and suspicion of the Boers. Let me try and examine the facts in connection with that. The House well knows that the Boers have always been almost fanatically jealous of their independence. Their independence was bestowed upon them in 1852, and twenty-five years afterwards their country was invaded and annexation took place in defiance of the Sand River Convention, in 1877. It was then discovered that that annexation had taken place, as I believe it did take place, under a misapprehension of the true desires of the inhabitants of the Transvaal. Then, in 1881 and 1884 their independence was restored; they were subject to the provisions of the Convention of 1884, but their internal independence was restored. It is not to be wondered at that after the violation of the Sand River Convention in 1877 they should be jealous and suspicious in the highest degree of the intentions of the Government of a country which after all was 6,000 miles away, and comparatively little known to an ignorant population. It was upon this soil that the policy of Her Majesty's Government since 1895 fell. What was the first thing that happened? Within six months of the advent to office of Her Majesty's present advisers the Jameson raid occurred. Now, there is no man in this House—I do not think there is a man out of it—who does not now admit that the Jameson raid was a wicked and contemptible act. It was an act, the wickedness of which we appreciate the less—singularly enough—because of the supposed weakness of the State which was invaded. If we could conceive 400 or 500 British subjects actually making a raid upon German or French territory, and that Her Majesty's Government should expect that they should escape punishment at the hands of the Government whose territory was invaded, we may be able to imagine the effect of the outrage on the people of the Transvaal. The raid certainly contributed very largely in itself to increase the suspicious temperament of the Boer population. I believe every Dutchman in South Africa, and a very large number of persons on the continent of Europe, whether rightly or wrongly, believe that the raid was organised with the complicity of the Colonial Secretary. We are not entitled to accept suspicion for proof, nor are we entitled to accuse where our duty really is to inquire; but it cannot be forgotten that this disgraceful raid was followed by a Committee of Inquiry, which I say, in the face of the House, was a scandal to the House of Commons, dishonouring to the House, and dishonouring to the country. What were the circumstances? It was a Committee appointed after a promise given in Her Majesty's gracious Speech from the Throne in 1896 that there should be a full inquiry. When the question came before the Committee we all know that there were telegrams which were not produced, nor was Mr. Hawkesley compelled to produce them. What was still more important, Mr. Hawkesley's cross-examination was stopped. Lord Grey was not called, and Mr. Rutherford Harris was not called back. I forbear from further comment upon this Committee, because I believe if you speak privately to any gentleman, and if he will candidly tell you his thoughts, he will say there is a cloud over that transaction which ought to be cleared away. The inquiry was followed by the Colonial Secretary actually making a speech in this House at the close of the debate which took place on the Report of the Committee, in which he said that Mr. Rhodes had done nothing inconsistent with the conduct of a man of honour. This was said of Mr. Rhodes who had deceived his colleagues in the Ministry at the Cape, who had not communicated to the Governor the intelligence which it was his duty to communicate, and who had used information and telegrams from England for the purpose of misleading a number of young men into believing that they were acting with the Queen's authority. I am dealing with this as a matter that created suspicion in the minds of the people and the Government of the Transvaal. It is within everybody's knowledge that nothing contributed so much to shake confidence on the part of the Transvaal Government in its dealings with Her Majesty's Government as these most unfortunate episodes, and for my part I wish to say that I believe it is the duty of this House now to take up the broken thread of that inquiry, and, having regard to the general discredit which I am sorry to say has been created by those incidents upon the continent of Europe, as well as in this country, to pursue that inquiry to its final and ultimate conclusion. What was the next incident which contributed to the suspicion in the minds of the Transvaal Government? It was when the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary, for the first time since the Convention of 1884, claimed in 1897 suzerainty over the

Transvaal. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Plymouth—whose conduct and courage in this business will not soon be forgotten—has stated that after the communications that took place in 1884 it was against the national good faith to claim that suzerainty. I agree with him. I do not think anyone can read those Papers with an impartial mind without seeing that it was the intention not to maintain the suzerainty, and that internal self-government subject to Article 4, and it may be to Article 14, of the Convention of 1884 was to be bestowed on the Transvaal. I think Sir Alfred Milner was perfectly right in saying that suzerainty was a mere etymological question, and that the real importance lay in the adherence of both sides to the articles of the Convention itself. That is true. What is claimed under the suzerainty? I will not say under the suzerainty itself, because if you pursue it through the Blue-books you will find sometimes the word “suzerainty,” sometimes the phrase “position of paramount power,” then an appeal to “the letter of the Convention,” elsewhere a statement that this, that, or the other provision is outside the “spirit of the Convention.” It is a general, vague, intangible claim, and if we want to measure the degree of alarm that was created under it, we will have to follow the different claims put forward by the Colonial Secretary in regard to various acts of legislation by the Transvaal Government during the period generally from 1896 down to 1899. I do not state the Acts in order, but I will take them one by one, as it does not matter in what year they were passed. The Transvaal Government passed an Act against the immigration of aliens; it was an Act very similar to Acts existing in the United States and other countries. Her Majesty's Government complained of it as being contrary to the rights of Great Britain. Another Act was the Aliens Expulsion Act. Her Majesty's Government protested against that Act also, which was one to enable the Government of the Transvaal to expel persons whose presence was against the interests of peace and order. Then there was an Act passed to enable the Government of the Transvaal to suppress newspapers. Her Majesty's Government protested against that. Her Majesty's Government next claimed that the dynamite monopoly—which, after all, merely determined the question whether dynamite should be sold in Johannesburg at 85s. or 42s.—was an infringement of the rights existing between the Transvaal and Her Majesty's Government. The Colonial Secretary further criticised and complained of the methods and incidence of taxation in the Transvaal, and finally he complained that the law as regards judges—which was altered, I think, in 1898—was contrary to justice, and contended that that was a matter which Her Majesty's Government had a right to complain of. I am not going to enter upon a discussion of that law now, because I want to spare the time of the House. I will assume that the law of 1898 simply repealed decisions given by the judges in the previous year and restored the condition of the law which had existed from the very commencement of the Transvaal Republic and which had been supported by the authority of all the courts there until the previous twelve months. I am not going to enter upon the merits of these laws; I believe that in some instances they were illiberal and narrow-minded, and not such as a thoroughly enlightened Government would be likely to pass. But that is not the point. In the case of hardly one of these laws was it even suggested that there was any oppressive use made of them in fact as against British subjects. They were not liberal, but still they were within the right of the Transvaal Government to pass, and the position which the Transvaal Government took up in respect of them was that they were perfectly prepared to receive hints or friendly suggestions, but that they disputed the constitutional authority of Her Majesty's Government to insist upon the repeal of these laws. Now I want to ask what was the effect of these constant interpositions upon men who were already perhaps legitimately suspicious of the intentions of Her Majesty's Government in regard to their independence? When we claimed that we were at liberty to complain of laws relating to people coming into the country, of laws relating to their being expelled for violating peace and order; that we had the right to interfere with their press laws; that we might complain of such things as a dynamite monopoly, and that we were at liberty to criticise taxation, and have our criticism attended to, how much of local independence was left? Try and compare the position put forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies with regard to the Transvaal Government, with claims that he would make in regard to any self-governing colony of our own. I might add that he also claimed to interfere in the matter of education. Would he interfere with Canada with reference to a dynamite monopoly, or education, or laws relating to judges? If Canada passed any law relating to any of these matters it would come before the Colonial Office, and the right hon. Gentleman would not object to it. The constitutional claims of the Colonial Secretary were so extensive that he lifted suzerainty to something more powerful than sovereignty itself. After that, in the year 1898, practically for the first time, the claim of personal grievances on the part of the Uitlanders was put forward. They were never heard of until a comparatively late stage in this unhappy controversy. I am perfectly agreed that if there is oppression of British subjects in any foreign State there is unquestionably a right of remonstrance and interference on the part of the Government. The constitutional ground of that claim is indisputable. I do not wish to enter upon those grievances, but I would ask the House to allow me to state my own impressions and conclusions, after a very careful study of the Blue-books. I think there has been gross exaggeration in the statement of those grievances and in the nature of the ill-usage of British subjects. The police, or some of them, were quite possibly corrupt; they were rough in their usage and treatment of coloured British subjects, but as regards white British subjects there are, I think, only two cases mentioned in the Blue-books. One was the case of Mrs. Applebee, who was brutally murdered. It was not suggested that she was murdered by the police; the only fault of the police was that they could not discover the culprit. The other was the notorious case of Mr. Edgar. I know that this subject has been already discussed in the House, and I can only say, after having studied the evidence, that so far as a man can judge of evidence who has not heard it given, the choice of the jury in that case was between a verdict of manslaughter and a verdict of acquittal. If a verdict of manslaughter had been given, and three months imprisonment had been inflicted, it would have been a finding warranted by the evidence, but I must say also that the finding arrived at by the jury was warranted by the evidence. There was one meeting broken up; it was a disgraceful case, and as far as one can judge it was connived at by some of the minor officials of the Transvaal Government and by the police. No one was seriously injured, however, and it must be observed that scores of meetings were held after that without the slightest interference. That case, therefore, must be regarded as an isolated one. A matter in which decided and strong representations would naturally be made was the case of the employment of agents provocateurs in the prosecution of two or three men in Johannesburg, against whom, however, the charge was not proceeded with, although I think the proceedings were very bad, and the practice was, of course, scandalous. I must leave hon. Gentlemen who have read the Papers to form their own opinions upon these cases, but I must say that the violence of the denunciations that were indulged in by the press in the autumn of last year for the purpose of inflaming the people of this country into sympathy with the supposed oppression of their fellow-subjects in Johannesburg, to my mind redounded to the dishonour of the journals which stooped to it. Now let me say a few words with regard to the last stage of the proceedings. There was a Conference at Bloemfontein at which President Kruger earnestly pressed that all subjects of difference between Her Majesty's Government and his Government should be entered upon. That was refused. It was refused, rightly or wrongly, as a matter of policy; I do not wish to express an opinion on the matter, but it was considered that until the franchise question was settled it was unnecessary or useless to enter upon these other considerations. It is unnecessary for me to enter upon that now. It has been discussed by the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth, and also by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin, and the House is in full possession of all that can be said on the subject. In the month of August, 1899, the Colonial Secretary and the Transvaal Government were very close together. Indeed, it was only a misunderstanding apparently on the part of the Transvaal Government of the terms and intentions of a dispatch of the right hon. Gentleman which prevented an accommodation being arrived at. But all this time Her Majesty's Government proceeded to pour troops into the country; and while I do not at all think myself that there was any moral justification for the conduct of the Boer Government in commencing the war—for I believe that if Parliament had been allowed to meet there would have been no war—still, what can you say of the wisdom and the statesmanship of those who on the one hand were carrying on negotiations for a franchise settlement, and who knew well that they were within arm's length of one another, and who at the same time were arousing the natural suspicions under the circumstances of the Transvaal Government by pouring troops into South Africa? I know that blame had been laid by some speakers upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer for not supplying enough money to send sufficient troops to South Africa. All I can say is that I most heartily wish that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been able, by withholding the money, to prevent the sending out of a single soldier, because I am convinced that had it not been for the sending of these troops into South Africa peace would have been preserved. It was the fatal persuasion of the Government that the policy of menace and brag would succeed, that was the real cause which led to the deplorable position in which we now find ourselves. And what are the consequences? Some of the consequences which are apparent are, the enormous expenditure of money, the serious danger of complications abroad, and the loss of thousands of lives of brave men on both sides, all of whom have perished needlessly and uselessly, for their death will heal no feud nor advance any cause of humanity. And what is to be the further prospect? The First Lord of the Treasury told us yesterday, in perfectly explicit language, that it was the intention of the Government to carry on this war until the complete supremacy of Her Majesty was established all over South Africa; that is, until you have effected the complete subjugation of the Boers, and deprived them of their independence. Well, there has been a good deal of miscalculation already. There has been miscalculation in regard to military preparations. There has been still graver miscalculation in regard to political negotiations. I wonder whether that policy, to begin with, is practicable. Of course I suppose that with the enormous resources of this country it may be possible at some cost to do it just as, in the same way, if you throw a guinea into water twenty fathoms deep it may be possible to recover it by applying all the resources of civilisation. But what is the cost? The cost in men would be enormous in a country like that, at a vast distance from your base. I cannot help thinking that some little reflection may well be indulged in before endorsing a policy of that kind from a practical point of view. We are not the only country in Europe, and we have not got too many friends on the continent of Europe. I do not suppose that there are many nations who would look with sympathy or favour upon the endeavour to annihilate the independence of these two numerically small States. And what would follow? The war must necessarily mean, if it has been successful, the destruction of about one-half of the male adult population. Does anybody suppose that that is calculated to draw nearer the bonds of affection between ourselves and the survivors of the population, or between us and the subjects of the State? It would require an enormous standing army for an indefinite number of years. Lastly, I should oppose such a policy upon the old-fashioned view that it would be an unjust policy. This situation in which we find ourselves is the first fruits of the new Imperialism. If Imperialism means sober pride in the great Empire we control, a most earnest desire to knit together in the bonds of friendship the various populations that belong to it, a firm determination to preserve the integrity of our Empire at all costs, and the using of the means of advancing civilisation among all kinds and conditions of men—then there is no one more of an Imperialist than I am. But if it means departing from the old and honoured tradition of this country to respect the freedom of other nations, even if they be small nations, and to advance rather than to retard liberty which from the most recent developments I am afraid is its true and significant meaning—then it is the duty of every honest citizen of this country to destroy that spirit, because otherwise that spirit is certain to destroy us.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (MR. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The hon. and learned

Second Day.

Member, the conclusion of whose speech has been received with loud cheers on the opposite side of the House, commenced with a statement that there was no adequate sense on the part of the Government of the gravity of the situation in which we now stand. But as the hon. and learned Gentleman proceeded with his speech it became apparent to every member of the House of Commons not blinded by partisanship that that speech showed an absolute divergence from the Amendment he was about to vote for, and that he, at any rate, had no sense whatever of the gravity of the situation, or of the duty which he owes to his own conscience as a Member of this House. What could be more illogical, more immoral than for a Member to make a speech from which you gather that every step that has led to this war has been an unjust step, that the operations of the war are unjust operations, and then for him to go into the lobby and vote for this Amendment, which complains that the Government have been too backward in their preparations for the war? The hon. and learned Member had shown us over and over again that his objection to the Government was not that they had been wanting in foresight in their preparations against the South African Republic, but that they had gone to war at all. When we came here yesterday the whole country was looking to the Opposition for a statesmanlike exposition of their policy and of the policy which they wished the Government to pursue. The hon. and learned Member has told the Government what their policy should be, but he is now going to vote against us because our policy has not been the opposite. He has indicted the Government on one side, but what was the speech of the noble Lord who introduced the Amendment? That speech was a long apology for the War Office and a declaration, in behalf of the preparations for the war, that the War Office had not been backward. What was his indictment? It was that had there been a little less suspicion on the part of the Transvaal authorities, we might have been able to produce some result, although he did not go so far as to say that it would have been such as to prevent the war. Important as is this debate, it has not risen to the level which the country desires, because hon. Gentlemen opposite have simply devised a formula of opinion which enables them to vote together, though they held absolutely divergent opinions upon every point of policy. The noble Lord, who comes of a stock which has produced a good many politicians and some statesmen, spent a considerable time last night in justifying his position as a member of the Opposition which indicted the Government by digging from past records to prove from the attitude of other statesmen that it was correct to indict the Government. It may be statesmanlike to indict the Government when you have a policy to substitute, but to indict the Government on a long review of past events, on tags of speeches, and tale-ends of quotations from Blue Books when you have no alternative policy to propose, and never have had any, is not a course that rises at the present crisis to the expectations of the country. It is a course that is neither statesmanlike nor politic. The resolution before the House, if it means anything, means the fall of the Government. I do not complain in the slightest degree that the Opposition for party reasons think it desirable to bring forward such a motion, but when you look at it from the point of view of the country we come to a rather different conclusion. The noble Lord, in the absence of the First Lord of the Treasury, objected to some remarks which fell from him about the conduct of the Opposition, and said it would be necessary to remind him of the events in this House from 1882 to 1885. If my right hon. friend the First Lord will not take up the challenge of the noble Lord opposite, I will. It is quite true that the Opposition in those years harassed the Government of that day, and put the House to the trouble of continual divisions on votes of censure until they had accomplished the fall of the Government. But we did so in pursuance of a definite policy. We knew that the Government was divided as to the policy which had been pursued; we knew that our interests in Egypt and in Europe were suffering in consequence. We knew that the operations of one section of the Government and then of another were losing us confidence and success, and so we determined to bring about the fall of that Government, and we succeeded. That was a true policy, and the Opposition of that day only did what was expected of them as an Opposition. If the present Opposition succeed in overthrowing the Government what policy are they going to adopt? They can only by that measure effect either of two objects—they may weaken the Government, or they may overthrow it. But is the Government divided, or is the Opposition at one? The country cares nothing for who sits on these benches, or on those benches. What the country cares for is, that we should pursue this war vigorously to a conclusion. Now the question is, who can do it best, the Government or the Opposition? The Government are at one. All the speeches which have been made have not shown any divergence of view between members of the Government. But where are the Opposition? Have they got a majority? or how are they going to get it? They must drag into the lobby all the gentlemen who have made speeches throughout the country saying they disapproved of the war; all those gentlemen who object that the preparations for the war have not been sufficient; all those who openly say they sympathise with the Boers. They must drag in gentlemen like the right hon. Member for Montrose, who told the country not long ago that the whole differences between the Transvaal Government and the Uitlanders were not worth the bones of one Scotsman: they must drag in also the Leader of the Opposition himself, who indulged last night in studied ambiguities, and who in this matter sat upon the fence until he was tumbled over, by force majeure, upon the right side. They must drag in also all those Members like the hon. Member for Berwick Division, the right hon. Member for East Fife, the hon. Member for Haddington, who have all made it perfectly clear in their speeches in the country that there is no fault with the Government or in the negotiations, so much as in the fact that under no circumstances whatever did President Kruger intend to give to the Uitlanders that which any British Government would be forced to demand for them. These are going to be the parties who will find themselves in the lobby together. On what principle do they suppose that they will be supported by the people of this country, who want a more vigorous policy if it can be obtained, and a more consistent diplomacy if it can be found? I hope before I have done I shall succeed in proving to the House that the Government have some higher grounds for expecting a vote of confidence than was stated in Opposition. But if I had not, I could afford to quote the argument attributed to Charles II. in relation to James II., who said "they would never get rid of me in order to exalt you." I should like to say that in the whole of this controversy the point which I deprecate most is that this great question should be made solely the subject of party attack. The real question which lies before us is not a question of party recrimination at all. The real question is, was the Government justified in espousing the grievances of the Uitlanders, and, if so, was there any means, by diplomacy or otherwise, by which we could have obtained substantial redress without going to war? The Opposition complain of our want of foresight in this matter, but the speeches they have made show a curious want of backsight on their part. This Amendment has been carefully drawn by a skillful Parliamentary hand on a question of time, but it has not been equally sedulously drawn in regard to questions of policy. If you look back you find that the grievances of the Uitlanders began before we came into office, and that the suspicions of the Transvaal Government were roused long before the present Government came into power. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dumfries Burghs told us that the grievances were immensely exaggerated. I do not think it is possible to treat these grievances as the hon. and learned Gentleman treated them. What were these grievances? These Uitlanders had no municipal government, no police protection, no organised maintenance of order; they had no even-handed administration, no Parliamentary representation. It is quite true that though they were a majority of the population in number, they had no power or voice in the State; they paid nine-tenths of the taxation, and they had nothing to do with the governing body. But that was not all. If that had occurred to British subjects in other parts of the world, it may be that the hon. and learned Member and those who think with him might be justified in hinting that their case might have been met by Convention. Well, we had Conventions with the Transvaal. We had agreements. I will not go so far as to say how many of the grievances could be put down to breaches, and how many to evasions, of the agreements. There were the granting of monopolies, the war tax, the discrimination in other taxation, etc. The whole spirit of the agreements was violated, a spirit of oppression was shown, and a spirit of opposition was roused, and it was almost impossible for any Government to avoid being drawn into the controversy. Very much has been said as to the opinion which Europe holds in regard to this matter. But I venture to remind the House that that was not the opinion before the war; that was not the verdict of the European press, when, before the war, the question was not merely one of the success of the British arms, but of justice to members of other nationalities who were under oppression. A quotation has been made in this House from an Austrian newspaper, the Pester Lloyd. In July last it said, "No Great Power can tolerate such treatment of its subjects as British subjects endure in the Transvaal," and that "if England does so her predominance in South Africa would be destroyed."

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE (Wiltshire, Cricklade): The right hon. Gentleman quotes from the Pester Lloyd. Does he mean to say that that is an Austrian paper? It is an Hungarian paper.

*MR. BRODRICK: This country is Great Britain and Ireland, but I do not take the trouble every time I speak of Great Britain to mention Ireland.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The relations between Great Britain and Ireland are very different to those between Austria and Hungary.

*MR. BRODRICK: As the noble Lord is a purist, I would study to follow him in future, but I think his interruption on this trifling question is a measure of the breadth of view he takes on the whole South African subject.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I only wished to point out that it is not fair to quote the Pester Lloyd as illustrating Austrian opinion, because Austrian and Hungarian opinion on this matter has shown the widest divergence.

*MR. BRODRICK: So it may; but what I want to say is, that hon. Members opposite should not judge by the tone now shown in the press of Europe what was the opinion of the Governments of Europe, and the opinion of the press of Europe, before the war was declared, with regard to the grievances of the Uitlanders. On that point we have obtained no guidance whatever. It is quite true that the hon. and learned Member, like the hon. Member for Poplar who spoke before him, illustrated his arguments by a good many suggestions, some of which I do not think the Government will accept. The hon. and learned Member quoted figures showing that £1,186,000 was the expenditure of the Transvaal on their military services. That, no doubt, was intended to prove how innocent President Kruger was of any idea of offence against this country, how absolutely the Transvaal was set on home defence, and how unjustified we should have been in undertaking these preparations for war upon which he is going into the lobby to vote. There would have been some point in the observation before the war began, but every one who has any knowledge of figures knows now that the sum quoted would not produce a half, a third, or a quarter of the munitions of war which the Transvaal Government had put into the field. The true sum which the Transvaal has been spending has not been stated, because the Boers knew that if it had been stated correctly their designs would have been unmasked, and the Transvaal has been smuggling in munitions of war so as to gull this country into fancied security. That being so, I wonder the hon. and learned Member has thought it worth his while to put these figures before the House. Has he been altogether blind to our casualties? Has not he read of the positions held against British troops? When he tells us that all the statements about Kruger are a myth, then I am bound to retort that these figures taken alone are an imposture. In the same way I cannot help referring to certain arguments addressed to us by the hon. Member for Poplar. The hon. Member for Poplar told us that the raid would never have occurred if it had not been for the advent of this Government into power, and their having remained in office. The hon. Gentleman's argument was that there was a strip of Bechuanaland which we had granted to the Chartered Company, and that that strip the Chartered Company made their jumping-off point. It was a subtle but inconclusive argument. If there was an obligation to hand this strip of territory over to the Chartered Company, it had to be handed over according to the obligation incurred.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: We were bound to do so in time, but not at that time.

*MR. BRODRICK: Then I join the hon. Gentleman in the same category as the noble Lord who tries to carry out his duty in a great national crisis by using similar arguments. No one on this side of the House defends the raid. No one has lost more by the raid than the Government, and no one feels more than the Government how much it has handicapped us in our negotiations. It has handicapped us not because the suspicions engendered made it impossible for the Transvaal Government to believe in the integrity of British statesmen, but because it occurred at a moment when President Kruger had almost reached the end of the endurance of his own burghers in the unreasonableness of the treatment of the Uitlanders. If for a few months more the system of terrorising by means of an oligarchical Government over a great body of men paying nearly the whole of the expenses of government of the country had been allowed to continue, there were many evidences to show that even the burghers were ready to go further in concession than their President has lately been. If that system had endured for a short time longer, and if the catastrophe had not been precipitated by these misguided men, that which happened in all civilised States sooner or later must have come about, where one man insisted upon pursuing an unreasonable policy against the wishes of those around him. You are ready enough to attribute it to the blunders of the Colonial Secretary, but not one of you will stand bail that the President of the Transvaal would ever have acted reasonably of his own free will towards the Uitlander. So long as that man is there, nothing will be done, and it is idle for hon. Gentlemen opposite to get up and tell us there was no objection to giving freedom to the Uitlanders. I deeply regretted to hear the reference of the hon. and learned Member to the proceedings of a Committee of the House. Though I have been a Member of the House for twenty years, I have never heard an hon. Member before dare to tell the House that the proceedings of its own Committee were dishonouring to it.

AN HON. MEMBER: It is quite time, too.

*MR. BRODRICK: The hon. Member said there was a cloud over that Committee.

AN HON. MEMBER: Produce the correspondence.

*MR. BRODRICK: It was a Committee which included the Leader of the Opposition, who voted for a practically unanimous Report, the late Leader of the Opposition, the hon. Member for Poplar, the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Nottingham, and other Members of the Liberal party, and yet the hon. Member is going into the lobby in common cause with those hon. Gentlemen against the Government with the declaration that the proceedings of that Committee were dishonouring to the House of Commons. I think that the speech of the hon. Member was not only an illogical speech, but a highly immoral speech. It is said that there were ulterior motives behind, that Members on the Government side had something to conceal. That suggestion has often been disproved in this House before. If the suggestion is to be made it would be much better if it were openly made. Hon. Members have preserved an amusing silence with regard to their indictment of the Government for their want of military preparations. That will be dealt with at more length by the representative of the War Office. Up to this moment we have not heard what it is they accuse the Government of. The reference has been dragged into the end of the resolution to catch the votes of a few stray Members on their own side, like the hon. Member for South Shields, but if a suggestion of this kind is to be made, it should be supported by facts. The only suggestion which we have had is that the Council for National Defence has been established for the purpose of overruling the decision of the Secretary of State. I never heard before that the establishment of a Cabinet Committee was for the purpose of overruling the particular office which might be engaged in certain work. I look upon the establishment of a body which will connect all the numerous departments which must be welded together on questions of national defence—the War Office, the Admiralty, the Treasury, the Colonial and Foreign Offices—as a most important step in our military organisation. It lies with the right hon. Gentleman to show how that council could have interfered with the furtherance of the military operations.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: We do not know anything about it.

*MR. BRODRICK: It would have been better, then, if, like other fishing suggestions of the right hon. Gentleman, the remark had not been thrown out. If the right hon. Gentleman is so anxious to water down the responsibility of the Secretary of State, it may be necessary some day to show the House how far the right hon. Gentleman, when in power, appreciated that responsibility. If the right hon. Gentleman challenges me, I will take up the challenge. My respect for the right hon. Gentleman as a man is very great, but it will not prevent me from dwelling somewhat on his acts as a Minister. The case of the Government with regard to the whole question is this; we are accused of errors and of vacillation. The errors have to some extent been pointed out, but no one has even suggested where the vacillation has occurred. The case of the Government is that, having recognised the grievances of the Uitlanders, we have striven to obtain redress for those grievances in whatever form might be most acceptable to the authorities of the Transvaal. If the Transvaal were willing to make concessions, well and good. If they were willing to give any form of franchise which would give effective representation to the Uitlanders, her Majesty's Government were ready to accept that. No man on the Opposition side of the House can complain that the Government have been unduly rapid in their operations. From the time of the raid to the time of the declaration of the war is a period of nearly four years. During that period every effort has been made to induce the Transvaal Government to meet the grievances, but all efforts failed. Would hon. Members opposite then have shut up the book, have admitted their failure, and gone no further? Would they, knowing the enormous preparations of the Transvaal, have taken no steps to defend the colonies? The noble Lord complained of the Foreign Office not issuing an edict to forbid the export of arms in June of last year. Such an edict would have been as direct a provocation to the Transvaal as the sending of troops, and would have been quite ineffective for its purpose, because they could have imported arms from elsewhere. The right hon. Gentleman opposite said that this was the very time for effective criticism. The criticism might be effective from a party standpoint; but it is doubtful whether this frontal attack is the wisest strategy for right hon. Gentlemen opposite. It is difficult to see how this criticism can be effective from a patriotic standpoint. Not one word has been said to assist the Government in regard to the problems which they have to decide in the future. There is only one direction in which this Amendment can be effective—it will be a direct solace and encouragement to the Boers. The essence of the Amendment is that the Government has blundered into war. Those who hold that opinion must hold the Government guilty of the war; and that gives the clearest evidence to those arrayed against us in the field that they it is who are to be regarded as the injured persons. That is the evidence for which the Boers have been waiting and praying for months. They look for evidence of the cleavage of parties in this country—of a cleavage of opinion which may result in our abandonment of the war, or, if it is still pursued, which will result in their obtaining terms such as the Government have now no intention of granting. I do not believe that hon. Gentlemen opposite represent the feeling of the country in establishing this cleavage in the House of Commons, and I believe that the country will resent the immense difficulty which has been created by this action for our soldiers in the field. I know that there are men opposite who are not thinking of party considerations; and I know that there are behind the Treasury bench a large body of men determined that the Government shall not fail in any duty which a patriotic Englishman would wish to be fulfilled. Although some of my hon. friends may have misgivings as to a part of the military operations of the past, and are determined that by every means at their disposal the Government shall be kept up to the mark, they will not accept an Amendment which must condemn the efforts made by the Government on behalf of British subjects in the Transvaal, which must stultify the previous decisions of the House, and which must also bitterly hamper the Government in the vigorous prosecution of the campaign.

Motion made, and question "That the debate be adjourned till to-morrow" (Sir Charles Dilke) put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and question proposed—"That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

SIR J. KENNAWAY (Devonshire, Honiton): A vote of censure on the Government has been moved under unprecedented circumstances; but the object, I take it, of this House ought to be to show ourselves united before the world. Every speech that has been made, and every hour the debate goes on, prevents us being united. We want some hearty words to cheer up our countrymen and soldiers at the front, and that is not possible while the debate continues. I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will not, after consultation with the Leader of the Opposition, endeavour to bring this debate to a close, on Friday night at all events, so that the House may go on to the questions of the defence of the country and the Government may state the course they intend to take.

*MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): Allow me to call the attention of the House to the fact that this Amendment raises a question which has not been adequately debated on any previous occasion. When the justification for the war was last discussed the First Lord of the Treasury moved the closure within four hours after the defence of the Government had been stated by the Colonial Secretary. With regard to the division in this House, there is a division in the House and country, and no appeal the right hon. Gentleman may make to close that discussion will keep me silent. All shall be made known to the world, and I protest against any attempt being made to stifle the debate. How does it touch military operations? Do you think the Boers fight simply because we talk here? It will not affect them in the slightest degree, or the courage of our soldiers, and the military operations will go on whether we talk or not.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I concur with my hon. friend that probably in the crisis or condition of affairs in which the country finds itself it takes very little interest in the threshing out of old controversies and in the telling again of twice-told tales. But when he asks me to bring this debate to a close, I must point out that a vote of censure has been moved with all the formalities which could attend such an operation. It has been moved by a Member who sits on the Front Opposition Bench, with the full concurrence and in harmony with the Leader of the Opposition. On the result of the motion must depend the fate of the Government; and it would be quite contrary to all the traditions of this House if we were to stifle so important a Parliamentary interest, or to interfere with the privileges which the Opposition undoubtedly possess in this matter. It is for them to consider how far this debate ought to be prolonged, and how far the advantage of the House and of the country will be served by a prolongation of the debate. From every point of view I am desirous that the debate on the Address should conclude, because the House has been brought together, at an inconveniently early date, in order to deal with important financial business. The sooner we get to that business and the sooner the Government are able to make the statement for which the country is looking as regards our general military position, the better the Government will be pleased. But it is impossible for me to suggest to the Opposition that they should curtail discussion on a formal vote of censure on which, after all, the existence of the Government depends. That by all party tradition must rest, and ought to rest, with the House itself, and not with the Leader of the House.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Perhaps I ought to say a few words in following up what the right hon. Gentleman has said, whose perfect correctness or correctitude of tone in the matter has been recognised on all sides of the House. I can quite understand my hon. friend opposite desiring that the debate should come to a speedy conclusion. He would not have raised the debate himself, and he does not agree with the opinions of those who have raised it. But I can assure him that this is a matter which large bodies of men in the country desire to see fully threshed out in debate. That is also the desire of a large number of Members on this side of the House; and with every desire to make reasonable progress with the effective business of the session, I am afraid it is quite impossible to look forward to the early cessation of the debate. I know as a fact that there are a large number of gentlemen behind me who desire to take part in the debate and who have been looking forward to it for some time, and I cannot give any hope of satisfaction to the ardent expression of the desire of the hon. Gentleman.

Question put, and agreed to.

LORD SALISBURY AND THE TREASURY.—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, on Tuesday evening I, in answer to the noble Earl, expressed some opinions as to the comparative position of ourselves and foreign countries for the purpose of carrying on war, and pointed out some matters in which I thought there was room for amendment; and among others I mentioned the Treasury. What I said was that "by the exercise of the power of the purse it claims a voice in all decisions of administrative authority and policy," and that I thought "that much delay and many doubtful resolutions had been the result of the peculiar position which through many generations the Treasury has occupied." I was very careful to point out that I was not in the least degree intending any application of these views to the action of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. It would have been very unjust if I had, because my right hon. friend has been singularly careful and considerate in the exercise of the powers of the Treasury during the crisis of the last few months. I say here, and I said then, that the powers of the Treasury have been administered with the greatest judgment and the greatest consideration, and I exhorted the House not to imagine for a moment that I supported the idiotic attacks made on the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am sorry to say that in the other House of Parliament an impression was conveyed to the minds of some excellent gentlemen that I was censuring the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the manner in which he had administered his duties. I can only repeat what I said. "Idiotic" is a very strong word. I am afraid that if I used a stronger it would be thought to be uncivil. I can only say that I have expressed myself as clearly as I can, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer exercised his powers in the manner most conducive to the public welfare, and that he never refused anything which the War Office or the Admiralty thought necessary for the public service. But I have not risen merely for the purpose of saying that. I wish to point out that I spoke of the resolutions to which I objected as having been the result of the peculiar position which during many generations the Treasury has occupied. I think it has gradually acquired a position in regard to the defensive Departments very different from that which the Finance Department occupies abroad, and on the whole I think that, for the purposes of national defence, that is not a satisfactory condition. But, as I say, I carefully prevented my remarks from applying to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There is now conveyed to me a letter from a most excellent public servant, Sir F. Mowatt, who seems to think that because I did not blame the Chancellor of the Exchequer I must have meant to blame him. Nothing was further from my mind. I was blaming a system which has been the result of causes which have lasted for a considerable time, and which affect no individuals whatever, and in speaking of "the action of the Chancellor of the Exchequer," I include the action of those who are acting under him in his own office. The impression of Sir F. Mowatt is entirely unfounded, and although my personal acquaintance with his action is not very great, from everything I have heard, the public service does not contain a more admirable Minister of the public welfare than himself.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I very willingly recognise that the noble Marquess in the observations he made most strictly guarded himself against being supposed to make the smallest reflection on the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That was abundantly evident from the remarks he made to the House. With regard to the general question, which is a very large one, I concur so far with the noble Marquess. From the experience I have had I gather it is very often somewhat difficult in the smaller matters to obtain the consent of the Treasury, and sometimes I think from the feeling which is entertained by the other departments things which might judiciously be done are not pressed; but with regard to great matters of national welfare I would submit that the Treasury is by no means supreme. It is the Cabinet which is supreme. It is the Cabinet which is responsible. I never myself happened to be in charge of a large spending department; naturally I would not be as a Member of this House ; but I have heard a great deal from my colleagues, both in and out of the Cabinet, on the subject, and there have been, I believe, in most Governments from time to time considerable difference on points of that kind. But the Minister who is responsible for a department which requires a larger expenditure than usual for some great public object, who appeals to the Cabinet, and places his case strongly before the Cabinet, has a reasonable chance of carrying his point. But, in any case, a matter of that kind must come before the Cabinet, and if the Minister is of opinion that the subject is one of great importance it is his duty not to give way to the Treasury without having previously submitted it to the Cabinet, which is supreme. I must say that I have had some dealings with particular Chancellors of the Exchequer, and, while the Treasury is very difficult to deal with, if you have to deal merely through the officials of your department, who, however able, naturally have not the influence of the head of a department, I have found when I have discussed with more than one Chancellor of the Exchequer matters of importance they were discussed in a manner which generally ended in a way which I think was sufficient for the performance of the duties of the public service. I merely make these observations, for though I concur with the view as to the difficulty the departments have with the Treasury, I do not think the mechanism of government is such that if these great questions are submitted to the Cabinet they may not be dealt with satisfactorily, although the Treasury has the duty to place, and is bound to place in the strongest way before the Cabinet any objections which they may have to urge.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : If I may explain, I think it is a mistake to assume that it is only large measures which produce large effects. I quite agree that questions of large measures go to the Cabinet, and if the Cabinet think the Treasury wrong the Treasury is overruled. Just as a wall is built of bricks, reforms—salutary reforms—are built up of a long succession of useful changes, but it is in those smaller changes which individually are small, but in the aggregate are large, that I think the exaggerated control of the Treasury has done harm. I think it has had the effect of discouraging and impeding reform, and it has had besides the effect of taking away the freedom and diminishing the initiative of the respective departments. I do not wish to use language of exaggeration, but I think it is an evil, and I fear the great power which the Treasury has acquired in this country, in consequence, no doubt, of its great service in getting rid of corruption and extravagance, has been carried too far, and much of the immobility of the departments of which complaint is made is due to the existence of this undue control.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : I know it is out of order for me to speak again, but I should like to make this admission, that I do think that in some cases where the matter is not apparently one of great and supreme importance there have been things omitted to be done which have subsequently had serious consequences. Such things I have known, and especially this, that discussion with the Treasury sometimes causes undue and dangerous delay ; and I remember more than one case where things were allowed to tide over because of the long discussions until the moment for action was lost.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM AND THE DEAN OF DURHAM.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF DURHAM : My Lords, I beg to ask the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack a question of which I have given him private notice—namely, Whether his attention has been drawn to the utterances of Mr. Justice Grantham on the Bench with reference to a recent sermon of the Dean of Durham.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY) : My Lords, I apprehend that the question has been put to me because I am head of the Judicial Bench. The utterances of a gentleman like the Dean of Durham, I suppose, would be listened to with respect ; but I cannot help saying that, if deans will take advantage of their pulpits to introduce violent political controversy where no one can answer them, and where those whose feelings may be deeply offended go for the purpose of worshipping God and not for the purpose of listening to violent political controversy, I do not think it lies in their mouth to complain that others should take advantage elsewhere of the opportunity of protesting against such language and such observations as those to which my attention has been called. It would, perhaps, be a counsel of perfection if deans and judges kept themselves clear of political controversy. But that is not the question which the noble Lord asks at present. I have, by the courtesy of the noble Lord himself, been afforded an opportunity of reading the sermon in question; and speaking, I hope, with the calmness of one who had not been obliged to listen to it, I am bound to say that a more offensive, and, to my mind, a more mischievous oration has seldom been delivered from the pulpit. I do not propose to read the words of the whole of the sermon, but your Lordships will probably allow me to read one or two extracts. I think when it is remembered how, where, and when, these words were uttered one cannot be surprised that some people should be, at all events, deeply offended at the utterance. One very interesting passage is this—

—I should like to call your Lordships' attention to the word “such.”—

“The greatest sea Power in the world, then the only real colonial empire in the world, the land whose soldiers were far above all in repute for hardness and bravery, the land of an inexhaustible supply of wealth, whose trade truly followed its flag—this Power set itself to trample down one of the free small States of Europe. The Church blessed the effort—the little State was independent, heretical, an offence in the nose of the Imperialism of that age. They thought little of such a small country, hardly a country at all; they were the haughty overlords over it; these were the unfortunate Beggars whose resistance could not stand more than a few months before the strongest Power in Europe (which had the men, the guns, and the money too). They treated their ragged enemies with contempt, their free life should go, the Imperial Power must prevail, and the Church again should control the erring people with the grim control of fire and sword. Need I carry on the parallel? It is writ full large for anyone who has grace to read it, in the pages of history.”

With reference to the parallel, I think that if there is one period of the world's history and one military expedition which has been stamped by the reprobation of all civilised beings it is the great crime of the military expedition of the Duke of Alva in the Netherlands; and that is the parallel which the Dean of Durham thinks it right to mention. But the passage to which the learned Judge called attention was of a more modern character; and this sermon which was preached, as I understand, with the object of inculcating Christian charity and love towards one another, proceeds thus—

“What, then, do we find around us? With what spirit do we send out our fighting men? The drunken revels which form the music-hall ideals of good-fellowship—the excitement of the gin palace and the London streets—as if the bottle was the best prelude for the battle; the cries to the poor lads to avenge this or that, the greedy newspapers spreading unfounded slanders against our opponents, the insistence by which prejudice and angry ignorance have persuaded us that the enemy was but a horde of savages, who would run away at once. The whole temper of our times is so utterly anti-Christian that it appals me when, from the quietude of this home, I look out upon it all, and note the intolerance with which men hate opinions opposed to the momentary enthusiasm.”

Now, my Lords, with reference to this language, I daresay it is true that in some of the enthusiastic demonstrations which took place in the London streets, the idea of fellowship, in some classes of life, was to offer drink; and I have seen it stated that in some instances some of those poor fellows, taking leave of their nearest and dearest, did take too much drink. It is very likely to be true; but I ask is this the language, is this the mode in which the enthusiastic loyalty and bravery of those who are going out to fight the battles of their country ought to be denounced by a Christian clergyman in a Christian church? And now, my Lords, I come to the Judge's offence. When I first saw the controversy in the newspapers I am bound to say that I thought an easy answer could be given, because I thought that if one gentleman misunderstood what another gentleman had said he would apologise by saying that he was sorry for the language he had used. But I have the language here printed by the authority of the Dean, and for the life of me I cannot understand the difference between what Mr. Justice Grantham referred to and the Dean's printed words. The suggestion therefore that the learned Judge was in error in taking a newspaper report as evidence appears to be extraordinary in face of the fact that the report was perfectly accurate. Now I come to the more immediate question, whether my attention has been drawn to the remarks of Mr. Justice Grantham. Yes. The noble Lord thinks that I have some control over the judges. I am not certain whether I might not ask my most rev. friend the Archbishop of York what he will do with the Dean. I have a strong suspicion that he has a greater control over the Dean than I have over the Judge. For the benefit of the people of this country it has long been a regular and ascertained rule, and established by statute, that the judges are perfectly independent of all control, except that an Address may be moved in the Houses of Parliament. Perhaps the noble Lord would like to take that course. I do not promise him much support; but that is the only constitutional course. Although I may say that the counsel of perfection is one which I would myself prefer, I do not at all wonder at Mr. Justice Grantham, who has taken a deep and most useful interest in the Volunteers, and has been able to assist them in their efforts to act for their country, being deeply grieved at reading what I think is a most unjust and improper observation, characterising our conduct in sending out men because two or three of their fellows, in bidding good-bye to their friends, had taken too much to drink on their way to the station. The Dean says he has not sacrificed his right of free speech as an Englishman. Neither has Mr. Justice Grantham. Mr. Justice Grantham is entitled to have his opinion. But there is this difference between them. The learned Judge addressed the grand jury, and the grand jury could, if it pleased, reply to him. In more than one instance a grand jury has replied to a judge with whom they did not agree. The Dean spoke where no one could reply, and, apart from any other question, I should have thought that that fact would induce a more modest reticence on the part of the Dean than he appears to have observed. The Judge is perfectly independent, and he exercised his rights as an Englishman in speaking as he did. As far as I myself am concerned, although I have no control over the Dean, I express my opinion as an Englishman that it was a great outrage to preach such a sermon in a church.

say a word with regard to pulpit utterances, and relate an experience of my father when a member of Mr. Gladstone's Government? My father went to a church and heard the clergyman say, in the course of his sermon, that Mr. Gladstone's Government was "a wave of iniquity howling in the unutterable depths."

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR.—SIR WILLIAM BUTLER'S DESPATCHES.

LORD MONKSWELL: My Lords, the Notice standing in my name—"To ask the Secretary of State for War whether the experience gained during the South African campaign as to the armaments and the numerical strength of the enemy in the field has tended in any way to throw doubt either upon the accuracy or the completeness of the information obtained as to these matters by the Intelligence Department before the outbreak of hostilities; and whether it is proposed to lay before Parliament the despatches of Lieutenant General Sir William Butler while in command at the Cape; and to move for papers"—was put on the Paper before the speech of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War on Tuesday; and as to the first part of the question I am perfectly satisfied with the statement he then made. At the same time, I hope the noble Marquess will not consider that I am unduly critical if I say just one word or two with regard to the delay which has occurred before the noble Marquess did what seems to me to be only a simple act of justice to the Intelligence Department. In putting this notice of motion on the Paper I acted absolutely on my own initiative. I did not consult any member of the Intelligence Department, and I do not appear in this House as the mouthpiece of any member of it. Owing to the silence of the noble Marquess and every other member of the Government on this subject for nearly three months, the public have been led to believe—and I think the very great majority of the public have believed—that the Intelligence Department has been scandalously inefficient. As long ago as 6th November the ball was set rolling with regard to the Intelligence Department. On that date no less a person than the noble Viscount the Commander-in-Chief is reported in the newspapers to have made use of these words—

“We”—presumably the Government—“found that the enemy were far more numerous and powerful than we had anticipated.”

Naturally, my Lords, these words were taken as an indication that the noble Viscount had no great confidence in the Intelligence Department, and the public distrust in that Department was intensified as, day by day, checks, reverses, and disasters were heard of, seeming to show more and more clearly how entirely the Government had been deceived with regard to the strength of the Boer forces. Not only did no member of the Government say one single word in exoneration of the Intelligence Department, but while the newspapers were full of these insinuations the Leader of the House of Commons went down to Manchester and made his “man-in-the-street” speech; and it was also reported in the newspapers, whether true or not, that Mr. Kruger had stated that he had entirely deceived our emissaries with regard to the importations of guns and ammunition. Parliament was not in session, truly, but to every one of Her Majesty’s Ministers the platform and the press are open, and, if the noble Marquess did not wish to rush into print or to appear himself on a platform, the task of exonerating the Intelligence Department might easily have been delegated to one of his colleagues. I think the noble Marquess will agree with me that it is unfortunate he did not find time and opportunity at an earlier period to exonerate the Intelligence Department. It is clear that the principal colleague of the noble Marquess, the Prime Minister, was perfectly unaware that the Intelligence Department was not to blame, for the noble Marquess said on Tuesday last that it was very probable the Intelligence Department had not got a great deal of information because they had not a great deal of money.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I do not think I used those words. I stated that getting information necessitated the use of a great deal of money.

LORD MONKSWELL: I think the noble Marquess implied that he was not confident that the Intelligence Department had given to the Government that information which it was desirable the Government should have. As to the despatches of Sir William Butler, the question has been raised in the House of Commons, and I ask for the production of those despatches on the two grounds that were stated in that House by my right hon. friend Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman—first, on the ground that the public have a right to know what advice Sir William Butler had given to the Government; and, secondly, on the ground that Sir William Butler has a right to have his character cleared of the grave charges which have been made. I must confess that it does seem to me rather strange that these despatches have been so long withheld. I beg to move my motion.

Moved—“That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty for the despatches of Lieutenant-General Sir William Butler while in command at the Cape.”—(The Lord Monkswell.)

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): My Lords, I understand the noble Lord regards the few words which fell from me the other evening in reference to the Intelligence Branch as, upon the whole, a sufficient answer to his question. But he added that he was surprised to notice my tardiness in defending that department of the War Office. He told your Lordships that so long ago as November last, the Commander-in-Chief himself had, in effect, pleaded guilty on behalf of the Intelligence Branch.

LORD MONKSWELL: No. What I said was that the Commander-in-Chief had used words which induced the public to suppose that the Intelligence Department had been scandalously inefficient.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I accept the noble Lord’s correction. The words of the Commander-in-Chief were that we had found the Boers more numerous and powerful than we had anticipated. Those words were spoken, I believe, without very much preparation, and may not have been as carefully weighed as if they had formed part of an official statement. But the Commander-in-Chief's meaning was perfectly clear. What he intended to convey to his hearers was that we had found opposed to us in the field a larger number of the enemy than we had anticipated; and that was, I think, a perfectly correct statement. I am under the impression that at this moment the Boers have placed every man in their country in the fighting line. In most of our forecasts we had anticipated that part of the Boer forces would be detailed to watch the frontier at other points. We believe that that has not been done, and that the enemy have put in the fighting line in Natal and on the western border of the Orange Free State, one may almost say every soldier that they possess. That was the meaning of the Commander-in-Chief. But then the noble Lord went on to suggest that it was my business, if I had noticed—as I presume he thinks I should have noticed—the attacks made upon the Intelligence Department, to exonerate that department in the press or on the platform. All I can say is that, if the head of a department, which, as the noble Lord knows himself, is somewhat hard worked even in ordinary times, were to take upon himself in a time like that through which we have been passing to reply to every attack in the press on himself or on his subordinates, he would not have much leisure left for the legitimate work of his office. With regard to the Intelligence Branch, I repeat what I said the other day, that although they make no pretence to infallibility, and although they are ready to admit that there may have been cases in which either men or munitions of war have found their way into the Transvaal without the knowledge of the department, yet, on the whole, their information has been carefully and accurately collected, and has been as sufficient as we could reasonably expect. Then I pass to the second question of the noble Lord. He asks me whether it is proposed to lay before Parliament the despatches of Lieutenant-General Sir William Butler while in command at the Cape. My Lords, we do not intend to present those despatches to Parliament. It is clear from what has been said by the noble Lord that he desires information as to the circumstances which led to Sir William Butler's resignation, and, I imagine, also as to the allegation that Sir

The Marquess of Lansdowne.

William Butler constantly supplied her Majesty's Government with advice and information as to the military strength of the Boers, which advice and information Her Majesty's Government are supposed to have neglected. Now, my Lords, as to the correspondence and despatches for which the noble Lord has moved, I am afraid they could not, with advantage, be presented to the public at the present time, but I am perfectly ready to tell the noble Lord that Sir William Butler's resignation was placed in my hands, and accepted by me, on the ground of divergence of opinion between himself and the High Commissioner—a divergence so great that Sir William Butler himself came to the conclusion that his presence in command in South Africa had become a source of embarrassment to the High Commissioner. That statement was made frankly to me by Sir William Butler, and it was upon that statement that I accepted his resignation. I also desire to add this, that in the Papers for which the noble Lord has moved, and which I am unable to present to the House, there is nothing whatever which has reference to any estimate which Sir William Butler may have formed of the strength of the Boer forces or of the strength of the forces which it was our duty to oppose to them.

LORD MONKSWELL: Do I understand the noble Marquess to say that in all these despatches Sir William Butler expressed no opinion as to what measures ought to be taken for the safety of Natal and the conduct of the war, if war broke out?

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: There were despatches, no doubt, containing plans of defence for the colonies—plans of considerable minuteness—and for that very reason I object to presenting to Parliament Papers containing very confidential matter, and which, moreover, it is not usual to present to Parliament.

On Question, resolved in the negative.

QUESTIONS.SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—SIR W. BUTLER'S REPORTS.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he will lay upon the Table of the House any reports or memoranda on the military situation in South Africa sent in by Sir William Butler during the three months before he was relieved of his command in South Africa.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. WYNNDHAM, Dover): May I ask the hon. Member to address this question to the First Lord of the Treasury?

MR. DILLON: I will put it to the right hon. Gentleman to-morrow.

MR. WYNNDHAM: I believe the First Lord will be ready to answer it to-day.

MR. BAINBRIDGE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the numerous comments which have appeared in the press with reference to the views and proceedings of Sir William Butler, and in view of the fact that the rules of the service preclude an officer from placing on record the true facts of the case, the Government will supply the House with such despatches of Sir William Butler, or such information as to the advice he has from time to time given the War Office, as will enable a correct estimate of his conduct to be arrived at.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): There appears to be no reason for laying any further despatches of Sir William Butler's on the Table of the House. His general opinions upon South African questions are very well known to the public, and there has been no concealment on the subject. I do not know whether it is worth reiterating in explicit terms to the House that he never in any communication to the War Office, public, semi-public, or private, suggested that the number of troops required in the case of an outbreak of hostilities would be anything like the number of troops actually sent to the theatre of war.

AN HON. MEMBER: Now sent?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, not now sent. I want to make this quite plain, as doubts are thrown upon the statement. The statement is this. There were sent out as a defensive force before the outbreak of hostilities 24,000 men, or thereabouts, to Natal and Cape Colony. There were sent out subsequently what is known as the Field Force, and those two together amount to a body of men well in excess of 70,000. Sir William Butler never suggested a number of men anything like that as being necessary in the case of an outbreak of hostilities.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): May I ask whether Sir William Butler did not send a statement of the Boer forces and of the strength of the Boer armaments to the War Office or to the Government, and whether, if such a statement exists, it may be laid before the House?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware that he sent any such statement, but if the hon. Gentleman will put a question either to me or to the Under Secretary for War, we will endeavour to answer it.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): The right hon. Gentleman in his answer has limited his statement to the War Office; may I ask whether he includes Sir Alfred Milner in that department?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not suppose he sent any communications on purely military subjects except to his military chiefs. I never heard of it, nor would it have been a proper course to pursue.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Did Sir Alfred Milner attempt to interfere with Sir William Butler in the disposition of the troops?

MR. DILLON: Had the reports from Sir William Butler reference to any plan of campaign or arrangement of the troops in Natal?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! Notice must be given of that question.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the Secretary of State for War will now consent to publish the correspondence between the War Office and Sir William Butler which led to the resignation by Sir William Butler of his command at the Cape, and the letter of Sir William Butler tendering his resignation; and whether the series of circumstances which terminated in Sir William Butler's resignation commenced by representations made to the Colonial Office by Sir Alfred Milner on the divergence of opinion on the South African crisis between Sir William Butler and himself.

The following questions also appeared on the paper—

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wicks Burghs): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will lay upon the Table of the House a copy of all the correspondence and despatches of Major General Sir William Francis Butler, from the date of that distinguished soldier's appointment to the command of the troops in South Africa in 1898.

MR. DILLON: To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will now publish the despatches sent by Sir William Butler while he was acting as High Commissioner in South Africa.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We are not prepared to lay the correspondence referred to on the Table of the House.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs): In order to clear up the mystery will the right hon. Gentleman tell us whether Sir William Butler was withdrawn, or did he resign? His experience was certainly of great value.

[No answer was given.]

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I do press for an answer to the second part of my question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think Papers could be laid, but there need be no concealment of the fact that Sir William Butler and Sir Alfred Milner had divergent views of policy.

PROGRESS OF THE WAR.

MR. W. ALLAN (Gateshead): Can the right hon. Gentleman give us any information as to the position of affairs in South Africa, particularly as to whether any further engagements have been fought?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no information to-day.

THE ALLEGED BOER CONSPIRACY.

MR. BAINBRIDGE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, either before the October session of Parliament or since, the Government were in possession of any evidence which justified them in believing that the policy of the Transvaal Republic (with or without an agreement or understanding with the Orange Free State) is the establishment of Boer supremacy over the colonies of Natal and Cape Colony; and, if so, whether any Papers bearing on this subject will be laid before the House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The conclusion we have formed upon this very important question of course is the result of the consideration of a vast number of particular circumstances which, at all events in my opinion, all lead up to the conclusion I have more than once expressed in public, and which the hon. Gentleman has embodied in this question. But if he asks me whether there is any statement by President Kruger or President Steyn to this effect, whether they have ever announced in public that they were parties to this conspiracy and communicated the fact to any British official whose words might be embodied in a Blue-book, of course that is not the case.

MR. DALZIEL: Has the Intelligence Department supplied any evidence on this subject which can be laid before the House?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: They are not a political body.

CONTEMPLATED MILITARY MEASURES.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY (Yorkshire, Shipley): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the great anxiety throughout the country, and the loss of time resulting from the present debate, he can see his way to state at once what steps the Government are taking, and what additional adequate reinforcements they are preparing to forward to South Africa.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I entirely recognise with my hon. friend the very great importance of this question in itself, and also the great public interest which it naturally and properly excites. But my hon. friend, who is an old member of the House, and the House generally, will recognise that it will be not only most irregular, but most inconvenient, to interpolate important business of this kind, which must lead to discussion, into the middle of the Queen's Speech. We, certainly, who sit on this side of the House and on this bench, are most anxious for every reason that the debate on the Address should be brought to a rapid conclusion. The House is aware that it does not rest with us, and, if blame there be, it is not my business to suggest that that blame should be placed on the right shoulders.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: The right hon. Gentleman is always very fair, so I will ask him whether he recollects the pledge he gave us last session, when the Address was hurried through, that ample time would be given for the discussion of Amendments to the Address this session.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know what the terms of my answer then may have been; all I have to say to-day is that we are most anxious, on public grounds, not for the purpose of our own convenience, that a discussion in which, I believe, the public take no interest whatever should be brought to a speedy conclusion. I never suggested that any undue curtailment of the debate should take place.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why do you not call in one of the generals to "take away that bauble," and abolish the House of Commons?

THE JAMIESON RAID—THE RHODES-HAWKSLEY CORRESPONDENCE

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the letters and telegrams passing between the late Assistant Permanent Under Secretary for the Colonial Office and the solicitor to the Chartered Company of South Africa, which were published in the Independence Belge, on the 5th January last, and which were afterwards republished in some of the press of this country; whether inquiry has been made as to the authenticity of those letters and telegrams; and whether such letters and telegrams are authentic and accurate; and if so, whether he knew of them at the time they passed, or at what date they first came to his knowledge.

The following question also appeared on the paper—

MR. BAINBRIDGE: To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the attention of the Government has been drawn to the publication during the present month in the Independence Belge of certain letters purporting to be correspondence relating to the South African Commission, and whether it has been thought desirable to inquire whether such letters are genuine.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The answer to the first paragraph of the question of the hon. Member for Mid Glamorganshire is in the affirmative. I have only personal knowledge of two or three letters from Mr. Fairfield and one to the Colonial Office. These are substantially, but I think not verbally, correct. As to the remainder, I have been informed by Mr. Hawksley that it has recently come to his knowledge that they had been stolen from his office by a clerk who was summarily dismissed in October, 1897. Mr. Hawksley does not say whether they are genuine or not. I had no previous knowledge except of those to and from Mr. Fairfield, and was only informed of their existence a few days before they were published.

MR. S. T. EVANS: My question was confined to the documents passing between Mr. Fairfield and Mr. Hawksley. May I point out that the right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last part of the question, whether he knew of the letters and telegrams at the time they passed, or at what date they first came to his knowledge?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: If the hon. Member refers solely to the letters of Mr. Fairfield, I do not think I saw them at the time, but I have no doubt they were sent under my instructions.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been directed to a series of letters published on the 6th inst. in the Independence Belge, written by the late Mr. Fairfield, the head of the African section in the Colonial Office, and Mr. Hawksley, the solicitor of the Chartered Company, of various dates from 11th February, 1896, till April, 1897, and more especially a letter dated 20th February, 1897, written by Mr. Hawksley to Earl Grey, a prominent director of the Chartered Company, and the administrator of the Chartered Company in succession to Dr. Jameson, C.B.; whether he is aware that these letters support the charge that the Secretary of State for the Colonies was cognisant of the Rhodes-Jameson plot against the Transvaal, that the Colonial Office had arranged to secure the acquittal of Dr. Jameson, C.B., and the Right Hon. Cecil Rhodes by the Select Committee of the House of Commons, and that an agreement had been effected for the suppression of the series of letters and cablegrams known as the Rhodes-Hawksley Correspondence; has he any reason to believe that these letters are forgeries; and what steps, if any, do the Government intend to take when a member of the Cabinet is deliberately charged with personal dishonour and public falsehood.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that this question has been answered already by my right hon. friend.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: No; the former question dealt with the authenticity of the letters, and not their import. I will read the paragraph.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member would not be in order in doing that.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It seems to me that all the questions have been answered except that in the last paragraph of the hon. Gentleman's question, a question which I suppose he hardly means seriously.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Yes, I do.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If he does, my view is that such accusations should be treated with contempt.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: That does not answer the second paragraph. Will the right hon. Gentleman answer or decline to answer it? I do not care which.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will answer that in the negative.

THE MAGERSFONTEIN ENGAGEMENT.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether there will be a full inquiry instituted into the circumstances that led to the deplorable loss of the Highland Brigade at Magersfontein.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: While military operations are going on there can be no inquiry of the kind suggested by the hon. Gentleman.

THE CABINET COMMITTEE OF DEFENCE.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can say generally what are the matters which the Committee of Defence considers and decides upon, and what are its functions. Does it deal with matters of naval or military strategy, and with the numbers and composition of the naval or military forces to be employed for specific purposes? Does it take advice from naval or military experts before coming to its decisions? Does it take into consideration the bearing of political considerations upon proposed naval or military action? How are its members appointed? And is any record kept of its proceedings?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Committee of Defence is a committee of the Cabinet, and does not differ essentially from other committees of the Cabinet. It neither removes responsibility from the Cabinet as a whole, nor from any of the Ministers responsible for the Departments either of the Army or of the Navy. Of course the Committee obtains the best information it can from experts and from others. Like other Cabinet Committees it keeps no records.

MR. DALZIEL: Is there any foundation for the statement that the Committee did not meet for six months after it was appointed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not seen the statement, and I really do not know.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Has there ever been a Committee of Defence in any other Cabinet before?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That does not arise out of the question.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: May I call attention to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman, I do not know whether inadvertently or whether perhaps because he did not wish to answer my questions, has not replied to the questions as to whether the Committee deals with matters of strategy, whether it takes into consideration the bearing of political considerations, and how its members are appointed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I thought my answer really covered the ground. My hon. friend must be aware that Committees of the Cabinet are appointed by the Cabinet. There is no special mode of election; we do not have a ballot in the Cabinet. The subjects they take into consideration are any subjects delegated to them by the Cabinet dealing either with the interests of the Army or Navy, or those two services taken in conjunction.

SURVEYS, MAPS, &c.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether in 1898 manœuvres of the garrison of Natal took place in the area bounded on the south by Estcourt and on the north by Dundee; whether in the course of these manœuvres the country was surveyed for military purposes by officers detailed for that object; whether the position of the drifts or fords, the nature of the banks of the river, and the advantages for attack and defence afforded by the locality were noted by these officers in their surveys; whether the reports of their surveys were accompanied by sketches and photographs; whether General Buller and his staff were furnished with copies of these surveys, sketches, and photographs; and whether there is any foundation for the statement that the British generals were supplied with no maps on an adequate scale of the country in which they were required to operate.

MR. WYNDHAM: Manœuvres took place in 1898 as far as the Biggarsberg on the north and southward along the Ladysmith-Colenso road. Excepting a rough sketch of this road, no survey was made. The map which the Intelligence Department had made in 1896 was used. Beyond this map—on a scale of four miles to the inch—there is no topographical survey of Natal, the making of which would be a question for the Colonial Government. None of the sketches, photographs, &c., mentioned in the question were received. Ninety-six thousand sheets of the four-miles-to-an-inch map have been sent to South Africa, besides large numbers of special maps and plans of localities of military importance. Provision has also been made for the reproduction locally of maps and sketches made by officers on the spot during the war.

MR. HEDDERWICK : Was any military map made of the frontiers of Natal ?

MR. WYNDHAM : As my answer shows, maps of the frontier were made. The military map on a large scale does not extend far into Natal, but it covers the ground north of Ladysmith.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Hereford) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to a statement to the effect that some time back the Intelligence Department of the War Office made an exact survey of the territory north of the Tugela River, that the officers engaged in the survey sent in their figures and details to the Department, where they were pigeon-holed and nothing more known of them ; and whether, on the advice of Sir Thomas Holditch, R.E., late head of the Field Survey Department in India, two engineer officers, Captain Close and Captain Jackson, with a staff of men, have now been sent out to South Africa to survey this part of Natal.

MR. WYNDHAM : A survey of Natal north of the Tugela River was made by officers of the Intelligence Department in 1896, and was printed by that Department and issued to the forces in South Africa. A copy of this map, which is on a scale of one inch to a mile, was sent to the Tea Room of the House of Commons on 20th October. Three engineer officers, experts in topographical surveying and map reproduction, have been sent to South Africa, but not for the purpose of surveying this part of Natal, which, as explained above, has already been mapped. Sir Thomas Holditch was not consulted, nor did he tender any advice to the Secretary of State. He wrote a letter to The Times after the foregoing measures had been taken or initiated.

MAFEKING STATION MASTER.

MR. SHEE (Waterford, W.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether James Quinlan, the station-master at Mafeking, was recently shot by order of Colonel Baden-Powell ; and, whether Colonel Baden-Powell has made any report of the circumstances ; and if so, of what nature.

MR. WYNDHAM : No report of the circumstances referred to in the question has reached the War Office.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Does the hon. Gentleman think it 'within his competence to obtain a report on the incident, which is said to have occurred before Mafeking was invested and has been much commented upon in the Cape papers ? Are the reports absolutely silent on the subject ?

MR. WYNDHAM : Mafeking was invested a few days after the outbreak of the war, and communication with Colonel Baden-Powell is difficult. I will look over the reports at the War Office, but I know nothing of the matter.

BARBED WIRE CUTTERS.

MR. NUSSEY (Pontefract) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, in view of the modern system of defence by barbed wire, have the regular troops, rank and file, either infantry or cavalry, or both, been provided by the War Office with wire cutters ; and, if so, what troops exactly, and how many wire-cutters have been sent out to South Africa, and on what date or dates, and by what ship or ships ; and, if not already sent, how many wire-snippers have been ordered, from what firm or firms, on what date, and of what weight and size are the wire-snippers ?

MR. WYNDHAM : About 4,000 wire-cutters have been sent out, and more are being sent out as fast as they can be obtained from the trade. During the present pressure of business in the War Office no attempt can be made to work out the minute details included in this question.

INOCULATION OF TROOPS AGAINST ENTERIC FEVER.

MR. A. E. PEASE (Yorkshire, Cleveland): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if the War Office has sanctioned the experiment of inoculating with anti-typhoid vaccine troops now on their way to the front; and if, in view of the uncertainty that exists as to the efficacy of inoculation as a preventive of enteric fever, and the debilitating effects of the operation, the Department will forbid the continuance of these experiments; and whether his attention has been drawn to the description in the Morning Post of 29th January, of the condition and appearance of the soldiers who had submitted to the inoculation on board the "Dunottar Castle."

*MR. WYNDHAM: The efficacy of the treatment appears sufficiently well established to justify the continuance of this operation, which is voluntarily submitted to by the troops.

LORD WOLSELEY AND THE INTELLIGENCE DEPARTMENT—THE BOER STRENGTH.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the attention of the Secretary of State for War has been directed to the statement of Lord Wolseley in November last in explanation of the British reverses in Natal, that we found the enemy much more powerful and numerous than we had anticipated, and to the statement on unimpeachable authority that the Report of the Director of Intelligence of the strength of the Boers in artillery corresponded exactly with the recently ascertained knowledge of what the enemy had put in the field; and that, moreover, as to numerical strength the Intelligence Department's estimate was rather over than under the totals now said to be arrayed against us; and whether there is any way in which these apparently contradictory statements of the Commander-in-Chief and of the Intelligence Department can be reconciled.

*MR. WYNDHAM: In the statement referred to the Commander-in-Chief did not question the accuracy of the information supplied to him by the Intelligence Branch as to the fighting strength of the Boer Republics. What he intended to convey was that we had encountered larger numbers of the enemy in the field, and that the military qualities exhibited by the Boers had been of a higher order than was generally anticipated.

BOER MILITARY STORES.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the Government received from time to time communications from the Intelligence Department as to the nature and magnitude of the military stores purchased by the Boers during the last four years; and, if so, whether he will state the substance of these communications and the dates when they were made.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Information has been given from time to time to the Intelligence Department on this subject, and, as the First Lord has told the House, we have no reason to question its accuracy.

THE BOER STRENGTH AT THE OUTBREAK OF WAR.

MR. BAINBRIDGE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, at the date of the Bloemfontein Conference, and in view of that Conference possibly leading to negotiations of a critical character, he had obtained information as to the strength of the Boer army in relation to the British forces available in Natal and in Cape Colony.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: There is no regular Boer army, but the number of men capable of military service was, I believe, substantially known.

OPERATIONS ON THE TUGELA.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether a Field Order was issued by Colonel Wynne on the eve of the recent operations on the Tugela; and, if so, whether he will lay the text of that order upon the Table of the House.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The reports on the recent operations on the Tugela have as yet been only telegraphic. Field Orders would only come by post.

MR. DILLON: Will the hon. Gentleman publish the Order as soon as it arrives?

SIEGE OF LADYSMITH.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether 200 children have been allowed to remain in Ladysmith during the siege, and whether any explanation of this occurrence has been received from the general in command.

*MR. WYNDHAM: It is not known how many children remained in Ladysmith. On November 3rd, Sir George White applied to General Joubert for permission for non-combatants, sick and wounded to go South. He refused—but agreed to allow them to go to a special camp four miles from Ladysmith. The townspeople refused to accept the offer, but the sick, wounded, and a few inhabitants moved there on the 5th November.

SIR G. WHITE AND THE GOVERNOR OF NATAL.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he authorised, or subsequently sanctioned to any extent, the pressure by the Governor of Natal on Sir George White not to withdraw at the outset of the war from Glencoe and concentrate at Ladysmith, on the ground that such a step would involve grave political results and possibilities of a serious nature.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have to refer the hon. Member to the Papers which have been distributed, and which give all the information in my possession.

CLOTHING FOR TROOPS AT THE FRONT.

MR. WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if the War Office is supplying the troops at the front with shirts and necessary clothing; and if not, if they will take steps to do so in future.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The War Office has supplied and is supplying the troops in South Africa with shirts and necessary clothing.

PUBLICATION OF NEWS AT THE WAR OFFICE.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War who is responsible for the editing and publication of war news at the War Office; whether Her Majesty's Government have given general directions as to the times at which, and the form in which, such news should be issued; and if so, whether he will state what these directions are.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The Secretary of State for War is responsible. No general rules can be laid down upon this subject.

CENSORSHIP OF WAR NEWS.

MR. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the operation of the censorship extends to the letters as well as the telegrams of war correspondents; and whether this is the explanation of the mutilated condition in which a number of press despatches arrived at the London offices to which they were directed.

*MR. WYNDHAM: No complaints have reached the War Office upon the subject, but I shall be glad to make inquiries.

WAR CHARITABLE FUNDS.

SIR J. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what sums are at the disposal of the administrators of the Patriotic Fund and the Imperial War Fund for the benefit of soldiers' wives and families and widows and orphans; is any assistance from them extended to dependents of soldiers other than widows and orphans; what is the usual allowance made from these funds to the widow of a soldier killed in action; is anything extra given on account of children; and, if so, how much for each child; upon what principle are the grants made, and are annuities given for life, or do the grants terminate at the expiry of a certain period; is an equal sum given in all cases, or do the Commissioners inquire into the circumstances of each case and determine their grants accordingly; and are any precautions taken to prevent the overlapping of the various national, local, newspaper, and other benevolent war funds now in operation.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The statements asked for in the first five paragraphs of the question are too long to be given in answer to a question, but I shall be happy to give a return if it is desired. The War Office, in conjunction with the Lord Mayor, has done its best to prevent overlapping of the various funds.

PROPERTY IN THE SOUTH AFRICAN REPUBLICS.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Sir Alfred Milner issued on 26th January a proclamation to the effect that Her Majesty's Government will not recognise as valid any forfeiture, fine, or encumbrance on property in the Transvaal or the Orange Free State subsequent to 10th October, the date of the commencement of the war; if so, was the proclamation issued after consultation with and by direction of Her Majesty's Government; does this proclamation refer to all property whatever, or to the property of British subjects alone; can he explain the purpose and scope of the proclamation; and will he lay a copy of it upon the Table of the House.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The answer to the first and second questions is, yes; to the third it is, not only the property of British subjects; and to the fourth, it has been apprehended that after confiscating property, which has been threatened, the South African Republic may purport to sell it, in order thereby to procure funds for the war. In answer to the fifth question, I will lay a copy.

AUSTRALIAN MILITARY CONTINGENT, ROMAN CATHOLIC CHAPLAINS.

MR. THOMAS CURRAN (Sligo, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can state the reasons that dictated the refusal of the application of His Eminence Cardinal Moran, Archbishop of Sydney, that a recognised Roman Catholic chaplain should accompany the Australian military contingent to South Africa, as was done in the case of the Australian contingent that was despatched by the Right Hon. W. B. Dalley to the Soudan in 1885.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The New South Wales Ministers asked whether Church of England and Roman Catholic Army chaplains could be sent with the troops or whether there are sufficient Army chaplains accompanying the British troops. The War Office, whilst expressing their appreciation of the offer, replied that a sufficient number of commissioned Army chaplains, including Roman Catholic, had already been detailed for service in South Africa.

TRANSPORT SERVICE RETURN.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he will agree to the motion for a return as to the transport service to South Africa, which stands on the Paper this day.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The return will be granted.

FORAGE FOR THE FRONT.

MR. STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether forage for the cavalry employed in South Africa has been purchased from abroad; and if so whether he will state from what countries and at what prices it has been purchased.

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS, Birmingham, S.): Forage for South Africa has been purchased from Canada, the United States, Australia, New Zealand, and Argentina. This imported forage is found to stand the voyage to, and climate of, South Africa better than that supplied from this country. Moreover, there are certain descriptions of forage, supplies of which are desired by the military authorities, which are not produced in this country. It is not usual to give the actual prices paid, which are always regarded as confidential. Oats have been mainly bought in London, but it does not, of course, follow that they are home-grown.

MR. STRACHEY: Can the hon. Gentleman tell us the amount paid per ton for hay?

INDIAN TROOPS SERVING OUT OF INDIA.

SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India what forces in reduction of the Indian establishment are now serving out of India.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): There are at present in South Africa, in reduction of the Indian establishment, two batteries of horse artillery, three batteries of field artillery, four regiments of British cavalry, and four battalions of British infantry. Besides these, one battalion of native infantry is serving in Mauritius, and another is under orders to proceed to that colony; another is under orders for Ceylon, and another for Singapore.

EMPLOYMENT OF INDIAN TROOPS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

MR. BAINBRIDGE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that the campaign in South Africa has now assumed a grave relation to the important question of the maintenance of the British Empire, the Government will reconsider their expressed intention of not making use of the native Indian troops, especially in view of the special adaptability of the Ghoorka and Sikh regiments to the African climate, and of the probability of such regiments being brought into use in case of an invasion of Northern India, whether by white or coloured troops.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: For reasons which the House I think understands and thoroughly appreciates it is not the intention of the Government to use native troops in Africa, but the hon. Gentleman appears to assume, by the last clause of his question, that native troops are not even to be used in the defence of India against any attack by any European Power. That, of course, is not the case.

MAURITIUS GARRISON.

SIR CHARLES DILKE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what is the composition of the black battalion, additional to the Indian battalion, which is at Mauritius in garrison; and what statement was ever made to Parliament with regard to its recruitment or service.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The garrison of Mauritius is composed of the 1st Regiment of Bengal Infantry and the 27th Regiment of Madras Infantry. The black battalion no longer forms a part of the garrison. The right hon. Baronet will find the establishment detailed on page 159 of the Estimates for 1899-1900, and a reference to the battalion will also be found in the Secretary of State's memorandum accompanying those Estimates.

PROMOTIONS FROM THE RANKS.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he will consider the advisability of filling up a certain number of the existing vacancies in the commissioned ranks of the Army by the promotion of some of the senior non-commissioned officers mentioned in despatches in the present war, instead of giving all these vacancies to comparatively inexperienced Militia subalterns and Sandhurst cadets; and whether, seeing that many of these gallant non-commissioned officers may lose their lives before the termination of the present war, he will take steps to see that the Gazette is issued without delay, more especially as such action will not only give satisfaction to the public but also act as an incentive to recruiting.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The suggestion of the hon. Member has been anticipated: and a communication on the subject was made to Lord Roberts on the 19th January.

EMBODIMENT OF THE MILITIA FORCE.

MR. WARNER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if there is any reason for not having embodied the whole of the Militia, so as to avoid leaving this country with so few trained troops; and how soon all the Militia will be embodied.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Fifty-six battalions of Militia are now embodied for service at home. With these Militiamen, and with the Reservists called up, and the Regulars left behind by regiments which have gone to South Africa, our barracks are quite full. A statement will be made shortly as to the Government proposals for the defence of the country.

MR. WARNER: Does that include the barracks in Ireland as full?

*MR. WYNDHAM: All barracks in the United Kingdom are at this moment full to overflowing.

MR. FLYNN: Is it not a fact that while the Irish Militia have been sent abroad the English Militia have been kept in the home barracks?

MILITIA OFFICERS AND RETIRED PAY.

CAPTAIN NORTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to the effect of the operation of Articles 489 and 602B of the Pay Warrant, whereby retired officers serving in the Militia are deprived of their retired pay during the time the Militia is embodied; and whether he will consider the advisability of issuing a special Army order, similar to that issued as regards non-commissioned officers and men, in order to place both classes upon the same footing in this respect.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The whole case is under consideration.

THE FIRST MILITIA REGIMENT.

SIR E. T. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War why the men of the first Militia Regiment embarked for South Africa were sent out in their winter clothes, and why they were not equipped in khaki, or some other description of uniform suitable for active service in a tropical climate; and can he say if the regiment was accompanied with a Maxim gun; if not, why not.

*MR. WYNDHAM: It was found impossible to clothe this battalion in khaki before it embarked, owing to the very heavy calls on the Clothing Department. The khaki was ready shortly after, and will be dispatched in charge of an officer of the battalion. This officer will also take out the machine gun, for instruction in the use of which he had remained behind.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' COMMISSIONS.

MR. MCRAE (Edinburgh, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether it has been decided by the Secretary of State for War that all officers in the Imperial Yeomanry, C.I.V., or service companies of Volunteers, who do not already hold a commission in the Regulars or Militia must enlist as private soldiers, and will afterwards receive temporary commissions to the ranks to which they are promoted; and whether any sufficient reason can be given for singling out officers of Volunteers, who after all hold Her Majesty's commission, for this treatment, to which officers of the Militia battalions are apparently to be exempted.

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): I beg at the same time to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether an order has been issued stating that Volunteer officers not holding line or Militia commissions who wish to volunteer for active service must do so as privates, and that on conforming with such order they will receive acting commissions; if so, whether or not such acting commissions would carry with them the usual provisions made for an officer of the line of the same rank on active service with regard to pay, allowances, pension, &c.; and whether, on return from active service a Volunteer officer would lose seniority or might find that, his place having been filled in his absence, there was no vacancy for him in his own corps.

*MR. WYNDHAM: In replying to this question I will at the same time answer the question put by my hon. friend the Member for the West Division of Salford. The Volunteer Act only applies to service in Great Britain, and confers no power outside it. It was therefore necessary to enlist Volunteer officers, and to give them acting commissions. They are given temporary Army rank, and enjoy the corresponding privileges as to pay, &c. On rejoining they will not lose seniority but will be held as supernumerary in the same way as officers of the Regular Army on rejoining from extra-regimental employment.

VOLUNTEER RECRUITING.

*SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Lllington, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War is it the intention of the War Office to adhere to the Special Army Order of 2nd January, 1900, under which members of Volunteer corps on active service are to be considered supernumeraries, and to restrict recruiting to the normal strength of each corps.

MR. WYNDHAM: The effect of the Army order mentioned is to allow Volunteer corps to add as many new members as they have sent men to the front. The possibility of further extending this permission so as to allow the corps to exceed its establishment is under consideration.

VOLUNTEERS AND RIFLE PRACTICE.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will consider the expediency of providing Volunteers with better facilities than at present exist for practising shooting; and will they be otherwise encouraged to obtain proficiency as marksmen.

MR. WYNDHAM: Efforts have been and are being made to acquire suitable ranges for rifle practice. The Volunteers will be given every encouragement to attain proficiency.

NEW RIFLE RANGES.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he can state how many rifle ranges in Great Britain have been closed within the last ten years, and what steps the Government are taking to secure a sufficiency of ranges for the due instruction in rifle shooting of the defensive forces of the country.

MR. WYNDHAM: A return of the ranges closed since 1890 was presented to the House in June last, and is printed as Sessional Paper 251. Since the date of that return one range has been closed and nineteen new ranges have been constructed or approved. Money is provided in the Military Works Loan for new ranges for Regulars and Militia; and Volunteers are assisted in acquiring ranges.

LICHFIELD RIFLE RANGE.

MR. WARNER: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if the purchase and construction of rifle ranges has been set aside during the press of work owing to the war, or if any progress has been made, and especially what progress has been made towards the range for Wittington Barracks, near Lichfield.

MR. WYNDHAM: The purchase and construction of rifle ranges are proceeding, and are not affected by the war. The provisional order for the acquisition of land for the range at Lichfield has been signed, and the confirming Bill will be introduced in this House immediately.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): Have the Government had under consideration the question of the improvement of the means of access to existing ranges?

MR. WYNDHAM: I must ask for notice of that.

INCORRECTLY SIGHTED RIFLES.

MR. F. W. WILSON (Norfolk, Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if the new Lee-Enfield rifles issued last week to the Loyal Suffolk Hussars, who have volunteered for the front, have been called in because they were incorrectly sighted for a thousand yards.

MR. WYNDHAM: I propose to deal with this matter in the course of my speech to-night.

MR. F. W. WILSON: But I hope the hon. Gentleman will give me an answer. Some of these Volunteers sailed yesterday.

FORCES AVAILABLE FOR HOME DEFENCE.

MR. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is able to state approximately what is at the present moment the effective numerical strength of the Regular Army within the limits of the United Kingdom under the heads of household cavalry, cavalry of the line, royal artillery, royal engineers, foot guards, infantry of the line, and special service corps.

MR. WYNDHAM: A statement will shortly be made as to the military situation. It will include the information asked for.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): Does the hon. Gentleman mean that a printed statement will be laid on the Table, or that a verbal statement will be made on behalf of the Government?

MR. WYNDHAM: So far as I have contemplated it will be made verbally by the Secretary for War in another place, and a similar statement will be made by me in this House. We will consult as to whether any printed statement should accompany it.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in consideration of the fact that after the brigades under orders have sailed there will be practically no Regulars or organisation in the country, he will state what steps, if any, the Committee of National Defence is prepared to propose for the protection of the United Kingdom.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It has already been explained that a statement on this subject will be made in a form more convenient than in answer to a question.

QUICK-FIRING GUN TRIALS.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether in 1896 trials of the 37 mm. automatic gun, which has been used in the present campaign by the Boers, were made at Shoeburyness; whether a year ago trials of modern quick-firing field guns, in competition with the service 15-pounder, were carried out at Okehampton; whether these trials took place under the supervision of experts appointed by the War Office; whether reports of the results of these trials were duly furnished to the War Office; and whether the Government will lay copies of the reports of these trials upon the Table of the House.

MR. WYNDHAM: The trials alluded to took place, though not at the dates named; in the trial of the quick-firing guns mentioned in paragraph 2, the service 12 pounder, not 15-pounder, was used. The trials were duly conducted under proper superintendence, and reports furnished to the War Office, but they are confidential, and their publication would not be in the public interest.

ALLEGED OUTRAGE ON THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that one of the partners of a firm of brokers was on 15th January, when he entered the London Stock Exchange, knocked down and kicked until he fainted by a crowd of stock jobbers interested in the war with the Transvaal, and that the perpetrators of this outrage thus ill-used this gentleman under the erroneous belief that his firm had refused to keep open the place of two clerks who had volunteered for service in South Africa; whether the Government intend to take any steps to bring to justice the ringleaders in this disorder; and whether, having regard to the fact that the Stock Exchange has been previously the scene of riotous proceedings in reference to the present war, he will take measures to prevent the repetition of similar outbursts.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): It was open to the person stated to have been assaulted to take proceedings, and I can take no action in the matter. The Stock Exchange is a private place, and it is the duty of the authorities of the Stock Exchange to take whatever steps are necessary to preserve order therein.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Having regard to the influence the Government possess over the Stock Exchange, will the right hon. Gentleman recommend the authorities to take action?

[No answer was given.]

ISSUE OF TREASURY BILLS.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer in what amounts, at what dates, for what times, and at what rates have the Treasury bills under the Act of last session been issued.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir M. HICKS-BEACH, Bristol, W.): (1) Issued on 15th November, 1899, to the public, in twelve months bills, £1,000,000, at an average price of £3 5s. 6d. per cent. per annum, and in six months bills, £2,000,000, at an average price of £3 18s. 4d. per cent. per annum. (2) Issued on 20th November, 1899, to the National Debt Commissioners, £500,000, in twelve months bills, at £3 5s. 6d. per cent. per annum, the rate at which the bills (1) were allotted to the public. (3) Issued on 30th December, 1899, to the Bank of England, £3,000,000, in three months bills, at £4 per cent. per annum. (4) Issued on 6th January, 1900, to the public £1,000,000 in twelve months bills, at an average price of £4 3s. 7d. per cent. per annum.

THE "VICTORIA AND ALBERT."

SIR E. GOURLEY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will be good enough to inform the House the cause of the capsizing of Her Majesty's new yacht "Victoria and Albert" when in Pembroke Dry Dock; whether extensive alterations are being made in the vessel's deck and masting arrangements; will he also state the nature of her ballast and if there are water-ballast tanks in all the holds and peaks, and the yacht's draught of water when empty and when filled; and where the coal bunkers are placed, and whether filled in part or wholly when the ship capsized.

MR. W. ALAN: I beg at the same time to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what was the number of tons of pig-iron ballast put into Her Majesty's new yacht at Pembroke to bring the vessel into an upright position; whether there is a serious mistake in her design, seeing the centre of gravity of the vessel is too high, necessitating the adoption of iron ballasting to secure stability; will this pig-iron ballast remain in her during her trials at sea; if so, why will it not be removed so that the vessel's stability as designed can be substantiated; and what is the cost and nature of the repairs the vessel is now undergoing at Portsmouth Dockyard.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. G. J. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I think I had best answer these questions by a clear, consecutive statement of the actual facts. In the calculations on which the design of the Royal yacht was based many of the weights, especially those connected with the structures composing the upper portion of the ship, must have been greatly under-estimated; and various additions to these weights, among which was an increase in the height of the masts, were sanctioned during her construction for the sake of improving her appearance and comfort, under the idea that the original estimate had been a sufficiently liberal one to justify these changes. The result was that while the dockyard officers supposed that at the time the vessel was floated she would be in the condition she was designed to be in when empty of coal and stores, and therefore perfectly safe, she was actually unstable when upright, and heeled over to a considerable angle. Owing to a defect in the caisson at the entrance to the dock the water could not be retained at its full height, and the vessel's bilges rested on the blocks and against the side of the dock. A considerable amount of crushing in of the outer bottom occurred, but the inner bottom was only injured to a slight extent. This damage is now being made good at Portsmouth, and the cost is being kept separate. Until fresh calculations, which are in progress, have been made of all the weights that have still to go into the ship it is impossible to say exactly what the extent of the error in estimate was, or what alterations will be necessary to ensure satisfactory conditions of stability, but they will probably include the shortening of the masts and funnels, the removal of a large quantity of silicate cotton which was introduced between the cabin bulkheads and in other places for the sake of deadening sound, and the removal of the greater part of the forecastle. In the alterations that are made the greatest care will be taken to interfere as little as possible with either the comfort or appearance of the vessel, or with her efficiency in any way. When the vessel was first floated her bunkers and holds were empty. On leaving Pembroke she had 270 tons of coal on board, and about 550 tons of water and iron ballast. In this condition she had a mean draught of 19ft. 6in. On the passage from Pembroke to Portsmouth she experienced a heavy sea, and proved herself an excellent seaboat with very easy motion and a total absence of vibration from the engines. Sir W. White, who throughout his long and distinguished career has had conspicuous success in producing ships which have invariably almost exactly fulfilled their design, accepts full responsibility for the mistake, for which at present he is unable to account. The matter will, of course, form the subject of a careful inquiry as soon as the necessary calculations to establish the actual facts have been completed.

MR. W. ALLAN : May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if it is the intention of the Admiralty authorities to keep pig-iron ballast in Her Majesty's yacht so as to render it stable ?

MR. GOSCHEN : The whole matter is under inquiry. I have nothing to add at present to what I have stated, and, of course, I shall be perfectly prepared to give every possible information.

MR. W. ALLAN : This is a matter of national importance. Do I understand from the right hon. Gentleman that there has been a mistake made, as his words imply, in the design of this yacht and in her construction, rendering her unstable for Her Majesty whenever she goes abroad ?

MR. GOSCHEN : A mistake has been committed. That is fully acknowledged by Sir William White ; but in remembering that mistake I trust the enormous services he has rendered to the shipping of the nation will not be forgotten. He admits he has made a mistake for which he is at present unable to account.

MR. W. ALLAN : Then—

PACIFIC CABLE BOARD.

MR. HOGAN : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that the dilatory proceedings of the Pacific Cable Board have occasioned considerable disappointment and dissatisfaction in the colonies concerned ; and whether he can state the position in which this important Imperial undertaking now stands.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : The Pacific Cable Committee have held two meetings, and are making inquiries with a view to the settlement of a definite scheme. These inquiries, relating as they do to technical questions, necessarily take time, but I have no doubt that there will be no avoidable delay.

EASTERN TELEGRAPH COMPANY'S CONCESSIONS.

MR. HOGAN : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether certain concessions have recently been granted to the Eastern Telegraph Company as regards the opening of independent offices in the Australian capitals in connection with their proposed new cable from South Africa to Australia ; and whether there is any ground for the apprehension that these concessions will seriously affect the financial success of the cable that is about to be laid from Canada to Australia under the auspices of the Imperial, Canadian, and Australian Governments.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : The application of the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company was, I understand, under the consideration of the Australian Premiers at their Conference last week, but I have not yet been informed whether they have arrived at a decision. The bearing of the application on the prospects of the Pacific cable will no doubt have been carefully considered by them.

ANGLO-GERMAN SECRET TREATY.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the secret treaty between Great Britain and Germany, with reference to Africa, will be communicated, either in its full terms or so as to convey its effect to this House ; can he state generally the subjects to which it refers ; and can he, consistently with the interests of the public service, give any information regarding it.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (MR. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford) : I am not in a position to give the House any information on this subject.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL : Will the right hon. Gentleman kindly state the date of the treaty ? Was it a few days before the meeting of Parliament in October last ?

FAMINE IN INDIA.

SIR W. WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he can state the number of persons on famine relief in the affected districts of India, the extent of the area and the population affected, and the estimated cost of relief up to 31st March and afterwards; and, whether he will now suggest to the Lord Mayor of London the expediency of opening a Mansion House Fund for subscriptions in this country.

LORD G. HAMILTON: The number of persons in receipt of famine relief in India at the end of January is approximately 3,500,000. The population affected by the famine is estimated at 49 millions, of which 22 millions are in territory administered by the British Government, and 27 millions in the territories of native princes. The area affected is about 550,000 square miles, of which 150,000 are in British territory and 400,000 in native territory. The relief expenditure up to the end of March 1900 is calculated to be between 3 and 4 crores of rupees. No accurate estimate of the probable relief expenditure after that date can at present be made. As regards the last part of the question I would refer the hon. Baronet to the correspondence which has passed between the Lord Mayor and myself on the subject.

HEXHAM RAILWAY ACCIDENT.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will cause an inquiry to be made respecting the accident to a cattle train which occurred on 31st October, 1898, between the stations of Fourstones and Hexham, on the road to Newcastle; Whether he is aware that, owing to the breakage of couplings and a subsequent collision, many cattle were killed and others seriously injured, and the remainder were detained 28 hours in transit for a distance of about 60 miles; and whether the railway company made any report of this accident.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. RITCHIE, Croydon): The accident referred to was not reported by the company. They were not under legal obligation to report it, and the Statute does not provide for an official inquiry. I have communicated with the North-Eastern Railway Company, and the manager informs me that the uninjured cattle were placed in a field adjoining the railway, and that they were removed the morning after the accident. No person was injured.

DUBLIN MUSEUM—REMOVAL OF OLD FURNITURE.

MR. DALY (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can explain why the authorities at South Kensington have removed from the Dublin Museum attractive old furniture that was so much admired by visitors, and of so much use to the Dublin people as models to manufacture from; whether he is aware that a catalogue was arranged for sale in the Dublin Museum incorporating furniture removed; and whether he can state what course he intends to take to get this furniture returned to Dublin Museum.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (SIR J. GORST, Cambridge University): The furniture in question was a loan from the Circulation Division of the Victoria and Albert Museum from the collection which it circulates to the Dublin and other museums in the United Kingdom. The loan has been left for a long period, but is now required for another museum. The furniture removed was included in the catalogue mentioned by mistake.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—SUGGESTED AMENDMENTS.

SIR J. T. WOODHOUSE (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is the intention of the Government, during the present session, to introduce a Bill to extend the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, to agricultural labourers and other classes of workmen not now comprised within the Act; and, if so, when such Bill will be introduced.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: The Government have always hoped to be able to propose an extension of this Act, but under present circumstances we cannot see our way to promising such proposals during this session.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received a resolution from a meeting of the Dockers' Union, held in Dublin, protesting against the decision of a judge excluding casual labourers from the benefit of the Working Men's Compensation Act; and whether the Government intend to introduce an amending Act in respect to casual labourers, and to the definitions of factory, machinery and plant, buildings, scaffoldings, distance of fall, time for service of notice and claim, and also other points which have been legally interpreted against the interests of the working men.

SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: Yes. I received a copy of the resolution. The hon. Member was himself good enough to send it to me. I have seen it stated that there is to be an appeal against the decision in question. Whatever the result of the appeal may be, there are no doubt several points in the Act as to which amendment will eventually be necessary; but I do not think that the Act can be said to have been interpreted at all generally against the interests of working men. I have already stated, in answer to a previous question, that we cannot see our way to legislation on this subject at the present moment.

IRISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what procedure has been adopted by his Department for the consideration of claims put before it by way of appeal from the amounts of compensation fixed for existing officers who have refused to act, or are not employed by the county councils in Ireland, under the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1898, and whether any opportunity, and what, is given for the views of the county council being put before the Department in respect of these claims, and how the Departments act when a difficult question of law arises affecting the right of the applicant to any compensation, and which there is not provided by the statute any power to determine by the Irish courts of law; and whether he has any objection to grant a return showing the results of the appeals in these cases up to the present to his Department.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. HANBURY, Preston): The practice of the Treasury is to ascertain and sift the facts of the case by correspondence with the parties concerned, and, having done so, and having referred to the statutes affecting the case as well as to previous decisions, if any, to calculate the sum which should be awarded according to the provisions of the Seventh Schedule to the Local Government (Ireland) Act, 1898. Before a decision is finally made, an opportunity is always given to the county council to put its views on the case before the Treasury by letter. When a difficult question of law arises, the Treasury consults its legal advisers. I am not aware of any objection, on principle, to granting the return asked for, but I think it would be better to wait until at least a year has elapsed since the Local Government (Ireland) Act, 1898, came into operation (1st April, 1899), as the appeals as yet decided are few.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has any objection to grant a return showing the result of the action of the Local Government Board for Ireland in fixing the remuneration of county and district council officials in Ireland where there was an appeal to them from the sums fixed by those councils; and what inquiry was made, if any, by the Local Government Board before they fixed the amount, and whether they consulted with the county and district councils concerned in every case before finally determining the amount in order to have their views on the subject.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): The salaries of "existing" officers of county and district councils have not yet all been fixed. I see no objection to the publication of the return as soon as it is complete. In August last the Local Government Board wrote to each county and urban district council inviting their observations upon the claims made by their officers for increased remuneration under Section 115 (18) of the Local Government Act, and all representations received from the councils in response to this request, as well as all entries on the minutes of their proceedings upon the same subject, received full consideration from the Board.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Has the question of the legality of all these claims been taken into consideration by the Local Government Board?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Yes.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): Were the council in each individual case consulted?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The Board's functions were confined to the operation of the 115th Section, Sub-section 18.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Will the same plan apply to cases of superannuation?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I must ask for notice of that question.

PARCEL POST BETWEEN ENGLAND AND THE UNITED STATES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether more than fourteen years have elapsed since negotiations commenced with a view to establishing parcel post between England and the United States; whether he is aware that there is a parcel post arrangement between the United States and several British colonies; and whether a parcel post has been established between Germany and the United States.

MR. HANBURY: The answer to all three paragraphs of the hon. Member's question is in the affirmative. Renewed proposals for a parcel post with this country have recently been made to the United States Post Office, and the Postmaster General hopes soon to receive a favourable reply.

CORK POST OFFICE.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, when the work of extending the Cork Post Office will be commenced.

MR. HANBURY: It is hoped that the work will be begun in April next.

CORK STAMP OFFICE.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any steps are being taken to transfer the Stamp Office in Cork from the Custom House to some more convenient centre.

MR. HANBURY: The question of transferring the Inland Revenue Offices in Cork from the Custom House to some more central position is under consideration by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue and the Board of Works in Ireland—but no definite scheme has so far been formulated.

TELEPHONE COMMUNICATION IN THE SOUTH OF IRELAND.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the Postmaster General has received representations from the Cork Chamber of Shipping and Commerce as to the great want of trunk telephonic communication between Cork and the neighbouring cities and towns of the South of Ireland; and what steps are being taken to remedy this grievance.

MR. HANBURY: The Cork Chamber of Commerce and Shipping ask to have direct trunk wire communication established between Cork and Youghal, Mallow, Tralee, Fermoy, Dungarvan, and Waterford. There are at present no telephone exchanges in any of these towns except Tralee and Waterford. At Tralee the number of exchange subscribers is very small. Efficient trunk wire communication between Cork and Waterford is already provided, though not by a direct circuit, but the number of messages is less than two a day on the average. There seems, therefore, no prospect that the amount of business would give any adequate return for the large outlay involved in carrying out the proposals; but if local guarantees are given the trunk wires will be provided.

IRISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT ELECTION PETITIONS.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will consent to publish as a Parliamentary Paper the judgments delivered by the Commissioners selected to try the Local Government Election Petitions in Ireland during 1899, prefaced by a brief statement of the grounds upon which the petition was brought and the relief claimed by the petitioner.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The cost of the preparation of a return such as is indicated in the question would be very great, and it does not appear to me that its publication would serve any useful object commensurate with the expense. Under the circumstances, I am unable to consent to the return.

IRISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT ORDERS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can explain why it is that the Return of Rules and Orders issued under the Irish Local Government Act, ordered to be printed last August, has not yet been issued to Members.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I understand that this return, which is a very voluminous one, will be ready for distribution in the course of a day or two.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Will it be kept up to date?

IRISH DISTRICT COUNCILLORS' DISQUALIFICATIONS.

MR. POWER (Waterford, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, seeing that the Local Government Board have stated that five tenants of cottages erected under the Labourers Acts who have been elected to the Kilmacthomas Rural District Council are disqualified from acting as rural district councillors, the Local Government Board have decided that they are also disqualified from acting as guardians; whether steps will be taken to have a test case under Article 12 (5) of the Order in Council on the subject decided; whether the members of the Kilmacthomas Rural District Council referred to had acted for a considerable time before the Local Government Board called their attention to the above-mentioned view of the law; and, if it is found that these five tenants of cottages are disqualified from acting as district councillors or guardians, will the Government insert a clause in their proposed Amending Act dealing with a matter of much interest in most parts of Ireland.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The Local Government Board's attention has been called to the fact that tenants of labourers' cottages, acting as district councillors, have voted for a reduction in the cottage rents, and the Board have been advised that tenants of these cottages are disqualified by the provisions of Article 12 (4) (e) of the Application of Enactments Order from being members of a district council, by reason of their being concerned in a bargain or contract with the district council. Disqualification from acting as a rural district councillor would carry with it a disqualification from acting as guardian. The Local Government Board are about to take steps to obtain a judicial decision on the subject in order to test the correctness of the opinion which they have expressed on the subject.

IRISH AGRICULTURAL GRANTS.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the proportion of the agricultural grant allotted to the relief of occupiers under the Local Government (Ireland) Act has been found sufficient to cover half the county cess upon agricultural land on the basis of the standard year; and whether steps will be taken to make good any deficiency.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The proportion of the Agricultural Grant, in respect of county cess, is, in each county, a fixed sum equal to one-half the amount certified to have been raised by county cess during the standard year. It cannot, as yet, be stated whether this sum is equal to one-half the present year's rate, as the audits of the accounts have not yet been completed. Whether the amount will prove equal to the proportion of the poor rate to be raised for county charges in succeeding years will largely depend upon whether the county and district councils are economical in their administration, or the reverse. If the rate for county purposes exceeds the standard year rate, the Government will not make up the deficiency in the grant, nor in the event of the rate being below that of the standard year will they demand that any portion of the grant shall be refunded by the Councils.

CAPTAIN DONELAN : If the amount is not sufficient to meet the sum raised during the standard year, will the deficiency be made good ?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR : I have already replied to that question.

ROAD MAINTENANCE IN IRELAND.

CAPTAIN DONELAN : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the desirability of giving labourers in Ireland an opportunity of undertaking the maintenance and repair of roads, steps will be taken to empower the various councils to carry out this work by means of direct employment.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR : There is no power, under the existing law, to give effect to the suggestion contained in this question. The matter, however, is under the consideration of the Government.

MR. FLYNN : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that power is given to the County Councils under the English Local Government Act ?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR : Yes, Sir.

RELIGIOUS CONVICTIONS OF IRISH JUDGES.

MR. DALY : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that out of 18 judges in the superior courts in Ireland only three are Roman Catholics ; and seeing that another Protestant judge has been appointed within the past few days in a country where two-thirds of the population are Roman Catholics, whether he can devise any means of remedying this state of things.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR : The reply to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. With respect to the second paragraph, it would appear to me impracticable and mischievous to lay down any rule which should make religion the determining qualification in the appointment of judges.

IRISH PROBATE DUTY.

MR. TULLY (Leitrim, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland will he explain why in the case of the Roscommon County Council only half the amounts payable in respect of probate duties on behalf of the different poor law unions in Roscommon, and half the amounts payable in respect of medical and educational expenditure and sanitary salaries, have been lodged to the credit of the council, and whether it is intended to lodge the remaining half with the county treasurer before 31st March next, so that allowance may be made for these sums in the rate to be struck for the half-year from last September to next March.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR : There has been some delay in the distribution of the probate duty grant owing to new rules having to be made by the Privy Council, dealing with this matter. It is hoped, however, that two instalments will be distributed before the 31st of March next. The recoupments in respect of medical and educational expenditure incurred in unions, and of sanitary salaries paid in rural districts during the half-year ended the 30th September last, will be made before the 31st of March.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION IN IRELAND.

MR. FIELD : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government will introduce a Bill to amend the Intermediate Education Act of 1879, or whether they will assist an Irish Member to introduce and pass a measure of amendment.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR : (Yes, Sir, a Bill is being prepared and will be introduced before very long.

IRELAND AND THE ALLOTMENTS ACT.

MR. FIELD : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government intend to extend the Allotments Act to Ireland this session.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR : I can give no pledge.

CODIFICATION OF IRISH STATUTES.

MR. MAURICE HEALY : I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland whether any Bill or Bills codifying Irish Statutes will be introduced this year.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR : I cannot give any undertaking that a measure of the kind suggested will be introduced this session.

JUDICIAL RENTS IN IRELAND.

MR. FLAVIN : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that tenants' applications from Ballymacelligot and Castleland districts to have judicial rents fixed have been lodged since March 1898 ; and whether, owing to the great delay that has been frequently caused in the hearing of fair rent applications, some representations will be made to the Land Commission to have more frequent sittings of that body.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR : I understand the fact is as stated in the first paragraph. A sub-Commission sat in Tralee in October last for the hearing of cases from the districts mentioned, and a further sitting will be arranged for by the Land Commissioners at as early a date as possible.

IRISH GOLD ORNAMENTS.

SIR G. ESMONDE (Kerry, West) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what steps the Government propose to take with reference to the Irish gold ornaments recently acquired by the British Museum.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : There has been a most regrettable delay in connection with this matter. Up to the present time we have not obtained the decision of the English law officers upon certain special points submitted to them. I understand that that decision will soon be communicated to the Government, and as soon as it is communicated to the Government I shall be happy to inform the House on the matter.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE.

MR. WARNER : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if Her Majesty's Government contemplate introducing legislation early this session to compel the clergy of the Church of England to obey the Prayer Book and the rules and ordinances of the Church as laid down by the Crown and the decisions of the courts.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The answer is in the negative.

RESIGNATION OF THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE.—VOTE OF THANKS TO SIR R. PALGRAVE.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) : I gave notice on Tuesday last that I would to day ask the House to pass a vote of thanks to their late Clerk, Sir Reginald Palgrave. I need not, I am sure, insist at any length upon the propriety of that course, which I am certain meets the wishes of every single gentleman I am addressing. Sir Reginald Palgrave was not only fitted for his office by great knowledge of Parliamentary tradition and Parliamentary learning ; he not only had that essential requisite for a Clerk of this House, a great knowledge of the long history and tradition which lies behind us, but he had, what is perhaps even more important in one in his place, that invariable courtesy which made him the adviser to whom all, whatever their opinions, whatever their standing in the House, could apply, with the certainty that he would give them not only a courteous answer, but all the assistance which his great knowledge enabled him to give. Under these circumstances I shall only be giving expression to the general view when I ask the House to concur in the following resolution—

“ That Mr. Speaker be requested to convey to Sir Reginald Francis Douce Palgrave, K.C.B., on his retirement from the office of Clerk of the House, the assurance of its sincere appreciation of the valuable aid it has derived from his intimate acquaintance with the law and custom of Parliament, acquired during upwards of forty-six years of devoted service in different offices, of which thirty-one have been passed at the Table of the House, where his accurate knowledge and ready advice have rendered constant assistance to the House and its Members in the conduct of its ever-increasing business.”

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs) : I do not know that this motion requires anything in the way of seconding, but I am sure I speak the opinion of all on this side of the House in saying that we entirely concur with the right hon. Gentleman in the appreciation which he has in such felicitous terms expressed of the services of Sir Reginald Palgrave, and that we shall all unite heartily in this public recognition of his services.

Resolved, nemine contradicente, That Mr. Speaker be requested to convey to Sir Reginald Francis Douce Palgrave, K.C.B., on his retirement from the office of Clerk of this House, the assurance of its sincere appreciation of the valuable aid it has derived from his intimate acquaintance with the law and custom of Parliament, acquired during upwards of forty-six years of devoted service in different offices, of which thirty-one have been passed at the Table, where his accurate knowledge and ready advice have rendered constant assistance to the House and its Members in the conduct of its ever-increasing business.—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

[THIRD DAY'S DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment [30th January] to Question [30th January], "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as followeth—

Most Gracious Sovereign,

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament."—(Captain Pretyman.)

And which Amendment was, "At the end of the Question, to add the words—

'But we humbly express our regret at the want of knowledge, foresight, and judgment displayed by Your Majesty's advisers, alike in their conduct of South African affairs since 1895 and in their preparations for the war now proceeding.'—(Lord Edmond Fitzaurice.)

*SIR CHARLES' DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): In one of Shakespeare's plays, the first part of "Henry VI.," a messenger comes in to the council and tells what is the state of things prevailing with regard to the British arms in France. He relates there a state of things which is very similar to that existing as regards our arms in South Africa now. I have no doubt that the messenger was not a popular person at the time he made that speech, and that the leading member of the council had the same view with regard to his statements of fact as the First Lord of the Treasury has with regard to this debate, namely, that the country takes no interest in it at all. But I cannot help thinking there have been, and will be, matters raised in this debate in which the country does take the very deepest interest. I certainly have become aware of such an interest by the ordinary means by which a Member of this House obtains information as to the opinions of his own constituents. We need hardly dwell upon the winter through which we have passed. There is hardly a Member of this House—I doubt if there is one—who has not relatives or dear friends either dead, wounded, prisoners at Pretoria, or dying of typhoid in one of those entrenched camps the history of which, as has been said by the greatest of military writers, is inextricably mixed up with the history of capitulations. The country has gone through an awful winter, and under our constitutional system there are persons responsible, and we have to examine the nature and character of that responsibility. Some Government speakers who during the recess have addressed the country have drawn certain comparisons between the occurrences in this war and those in the Crimean War. There is this great difference, that in the Crimean War the arms of this country met with no single check. We went even in that terrible autumn and winter from the victory of the Alma to the victory of Balaclava and on to that of Inkerman. Throughout the whole of the Crimean War the British arms never met with a check at all. ["Redan."] What occurred in that instance? The town was taken, it was evacuated that night. There was a slight repulse, but the town was evacuated on the night of the great attack, and Sebastopol fell with losses, even in the final attack, which are small compared with the losses we have suffered in this campaign, and without a single prisoner being taken. I remember—I am sorry to say I am old enough—on the night of the fireworks of the peace illumination at the close of the war—I was a child in the crowd—I passed the residence of a Member of this House who had illuminated his house with a transparency, in which he said, "This is a mourning for a war disgracefully conducted." I confess that I believe the present war has been far more disgracefully conducted than the Crimean War had been, and that the mourning is far more applicable to this case. Now, with regard to the checks or reverses—that is the accepted phrase—we are really afraid in these days to talk about "disasters."—the First Lord of the Treasury at Manchester distinctly stated there had been "no disaster." There has been no single great engagement in which we have met with an absolute disaster, but for the first time in our military history there has been a succession of checks or reverses—unredeemed as they have been by a single great military success in the whole course of the war—in many of which we have left prisoners in the enemy's hands. We began with the abandonment of the entrenched camp at Dundee, and of the great accumulation of stores that had been made there, of the wounded and of the dying general, and we lost the headquarters of a regiment of cavalry that tried a cavalry pursuit. We lost the headquarters of two battalions at Nicholson's Nek; we lost the headquarters of one battalion and a very large portion of another battalion in the repulse at Stormberg; we lost the colonel, most of the field officers, and the whole of one company of the Suffolks on another occasion. These headquarters of cavalry, and the principal portion of the remaining men of five battalions of British infantry, are now prisoners at Pretoria, not to speak of what happened to the Highland Brigade at Magersfontein, or of the loss of the guns in the repulse at the Tugela, or of the fact that thirteen of our field guns, besides a mountain battery, are now in the enemy's hands. The loss of guns in proportion to our small strength of guns is equivalent to the loss of some 300 guns by the German army. None of these events constitutes what the First

Lord of the Treasury calls a disaster. Probably he is right. But can any Member of this House deny that the net result of these proceedings has been disastrous to the belief of the world in our ability to conduct a war? Therefore, if there has been, as the right hon. Gentleman says, no one disaster, surely the result of the proceedings has been one disastrous to the credit of this country. There has been one immense redemption of that disaster, which is that all the Powers, however hostile, have very frankly acknowledged on these occasions the heroism of the officers and men. Our military reputation, which undoubtedly never stood lower in the eyes of the world than at the present moment, is redeemed in that respect, and the individual courage of officers and men never stood higher in the estimate of the world than it does now. It seems to me to be a patriotic duty of those who have in the past discussed in this House the question of Cabinet responsibility for military preparations to discuss the question now; to see who is responsible, whom I will not say we will hang, but whom we are to hold blameworthy in the highest degree for what has occurred. I believe that the opinion is attributed to the Prime Minister that the British Constitution is not a fighting machine. I am told he has thrown doubt upon the working of the British Constitution as a Constitution which will allow this country successfully to go to war. That is a very serious matter. The Constitution of this country has been maintained as a fighting machine by the Members of this House who are now responsible for the Administration. No one has ever put the doctrine of Cabinet responsibility for preparation for war higher than it has always been put by the present Leader of the House, and anything more direct than the conflict on that point, as on many others, between his opinion and the opinion of the Prime Minister it is impossible to conceive. Some of us have sometimes been charged with a certain measure of heresy upon this point. The suggestions I have made have never been those which have been made by some of my friends as to the appointment of a soldier invested with all power, in imitation of the Prussian system. I have always recognised the necessities of our constitutional situation, and, though the First Lord has sometimes charged me, or appeared to charge me, with holding these heretical views, as a fact I have always agreed with him on this point. The suggestion which I made was a suggestion that all Army reform should be accomplished in this country by the Prime Minister, that the Prime Minister should take the office of Secretary of State for War, as the only man in the Cabinet who would be strong enough to carry this reform through. No one has put Cabinet responsibility so high as the First Lord of the Treasury undoubtedly has, and he must see that this is the occasion when that doctrine of Cabinet responsibility must be pressed home, and responsibility for what has occurred must be there. The right hon. Gentleman seems to doubt that he has ever put that doctrine so high. We shall see. On Thursday last the right hon. Member who preceded me in this debate—the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs—delivered a speech, and made a statement which he did not make again last night, and a similar statement was made in this debate from the benches opposite. The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs said that all which had been done in this war had been “solely dictated by military advice,” and “military advice alone determined all that had been done.” I should like the House to consider what that statement means. The right hon. Gentleman was the member who, on three occasions, brought the question of the ammunition supplies of this country before the House: it was he who moved the amendment which turned out the Rosebery Administration on the cordite debate, and he led the discussion on two subsequent occasions on which we debated the same question. At the opening of the next Parliament the whole question of Ministerial responsibility for war preparation was thoroughly and exhaustively considered by this House. I confess that I did not expect to hear the right hon. Gentleman—who, on those three occasions, so firmly pressed, to the very extinction of the Government itself, the doctrine of Cabinet responsibility—as it were sheltering the Cabinet behind military advice, advice which he rejected, as also did the Leader of the House, with scorn upon that occasion. There was a dispute in the second debate as to what the exact nature of that military advice may have been, and finally we got out the facts in the third debate. When the Government was defeated, the hon. Gentleman opposite and the First Lord of the Treasury absolutely declined to accept that plea of military advice, and maintained the sound constitutional view of absolute Cabinet responsibility for preparation for war. I agreed with that view at the time, and I do so now. I feel it a duty to myself, and to all who hold the same opinion as I do, to press home this doctrine of Cabinet responsibility on this occasion. In that debate the hon. Member who seems likely to follow me in this debate—the present Under Secretary for war—took part. He was then a private Member and warmly occupied his mind upon this question, and he used these words—

“If they were overwhelmed by disasters the Minister for War would be held responsible.”

Not only he, but the whole Cabinet are responsible, and the present Leader of the House in following the hon. Member in that debate emphasised that fact, and pointed out the importance of complete Cabinet responsibility. That doctrine was emphatically maintained. There are practical reasons why this question should be pressed home on this occasion. This is obviously the time to press it home if ever it should be done, and it seems to me that such practical reasons are to be found in two considerations. We have been told that at the beginning of every war it is always fated that there should be muddling. We have been told it from both sides of the House that we always begin by muddling our wars. If there is one fact more certain than another it is that, in future wars, not with Boer Republics but with great Powers, there will be no time for muddling at the beginning of war, and it is vital that this muddling should be guarded against. If we are to look forward as a matter of certainty that this country is always to muddle at the beginning of a war, then we may look forward with almost certainty to defeat. The other consideration which I venture to put forward upon this subject is that I believe the Government even now do not fully realise what this war, begun as they began it, still involves. I believe that pressure upon this point, with reflection upon what has passed and their responsibility for what has occurred, may help in bringing home to them the great responsibility which still lies upon them in this respect. I have the strongest possible feeling as to what has happened up to the present, and I regard it as vital for the future that we should guard against any such recurrence. I do not despair even now of the military situation of the present war, and I do not accept those prophecies of evil in regard to the war which some Members have pronounced. I am convinced that it is our duty now to state the facts connected with the present war to the House as they appear to us with regard to the responsibility of the Cabinet in the matter of the deficiency of their knowledge and their military preparations. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs threw out a challenge to us in which he said--

"They had not heard the definite charge as to military preparations. Let them give us the facts."

I will try to answer that challenge, and give facts to the Government and to the House which at all events appear to us to demand an answer from the Government which they have not yet received. I do not wish to press the question of what was known to "the man in the street." I understand that the man in the street knew as much as the Government as to whether at a certain time, when military preparations might have been made, there would or would not have been war. That admission of ignorance at that time is followed by a more definite statement of ignorance as to whether there would or would not have been war with the two Republics, if war came at all. This question has been left in a singular position by the discussion across the Table of the House between the two Leaders the other day. The speech to which reference was made, but which was not quoted, was delivered at Dewsbury on the 28th of November last, and these were the words used by the Leader of the House. He said--

"If I had been asked two months ago whether it was likely we should be at war with the Orange Free State, I should have said 'You might as well expect us to be at war with Switzerland.' They were loyal friends, from whom we had nothing to fear, and who had nothing to fear from us."

That statement seems to me to be an amazing one in face of the facts. The House will note that the papers circulated here this morning bear upon this question, but at all events we know that, as the Leader of the Opposition remarked at the time, there was a public alliance between these two Republics, and that alliance had been strengthened after the raid and the conspiracy at Johannesburg with every element of publicity. There had been meetings and banquets, and speeches made by the two Presidents had been published to the world in which it was openly declared to be their common intention to wage war jointly if war could not be averted. There has been a White-book published this morning, and in it you will find that the Government knew on the 6th of September that "every preparation had been made by the Orange Free State" in the event of war to "attack Natal upon short notice," and that all the Free State farmers who generally stayed in Natal had already "trekked" from that State and sacrificed their sheep. Those facts were before the Government early in September. On the 21st of September there was a speech made by the President of the Orange Free State in the Raad at the opening of the war session, and in that speech President Steyn distinctly declared that in the event of war the Orange Free State would go with the Transvaal. I confess that I can hardly understand the statement of the Government that they were ignorant of the fact that in case of war they would have to meet the forces of the two Republics, and it seems to me almost incredible that in the face of these facts such ignorance could have existed in the minds of the Government.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Let me explain how the matter stands. In that part of my speech I was referring to the general course of events which had led up to the war, and I stated distinctly and emphatically that it was a priori incredible that the Orange Free State would be so idiotic as to sacrifice their independence in a fight with a nation which had never interfered with them, with whom they had never interfered, and with whom they had lived on terms of perfect amity. I was not discussing our knowledge of their intention or the military situation. We were aware that the Orange Free State had been nominally in alliance with the Transvaal, and we had no doubt that the great mass of the young Free State Boers would join the Transvaal; but we had no grounds for thinking that there were any diplomatic or international reasons why the Orange Free State should take action with the Transvaal.

SIR CHARLES DILKE: Then I understand that the Government wished the Orange Free State to join the Transvaal?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I said from a military point of view it had not the importance which the right hon. Gentleman attributes to it.

SIR CHARLES DILKE: I was trying to find some excuse for the Government under-estimating the extent of the enemy's forces and the number of troops necessary for this war, but I do not find the excuse that I expected on this point.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We do not want any excuse.

SIR CHARLES DILKE: I think it will be found that some excuse is necessary. The attitude at all events of the Orange Free State had been stated by themselves in an official communication to their Consuls-General in foreign capitals. It was to the effect that they intended to act on the terms of their alliance if they could not preserve peace, but that they were using all their efforts to preserve peace. Moreover, the Government, had there been any doubt as to the action of the Free State, had by their language made that action certain. The Leader of the House in his Manchester speech said that during the negotiations it was above all things the duty of the Government "to abstain from unnecessary menace," but they not only did not abstain from unnecessary menace, but they had also failed to make sufficient military preparations. I do not rely so much—unexpected as it was at the time—on the publication of Sir Alfred Milner's despatch of May, which caused a shock in the country and made war seem much more likely than anyone had thought before that time. I rely chiefly on some language used by Lord Salisbury in the House of Lords. We have no right constitutionally to draw a distinction between Minister and Minister, but you cannot prevent foreign countries from doing it. They regard a particular Minister as being a stronger friend of peace in any particular negotiations than another Minister. Lord Salisbury undoubtedly enjoyed that reputation in South Africa, and it was thought that his weight as Prime Minister would be exerted on the side of peace. Lord Salisbury, however, at this particular moment most conspicuously violated the duty which the Leader of the House said rested on the Government, and did so without making any preparations for war. On the 28th July, the Prime Minister, speaking in the House of Lords, used these words with regard to the Conventions—"The Conventions are mortal. . . . They are liable to be destroyed." I confess, looking at the negotiations at that time, if I had been an inhabitant of either of the two Republics I should have treated that statement of the Prime Minister as a threat of annexation, and as holding out the prospect of a war in which the independence of my country would be taken away. Were these words, whether wise or unwise in themselves, wise when used without the smallest preparation for war having been made? Afterwards, more language of a similar kind was used, but it is on these words used at that particular period that I mostly rely. I think it is established that the Government at that time did not expect war, or, at any rate, war with the two Republics. At all events they hoped against war; but the language I have quoted made war more probable. Did the Government have before them ample information as to what this war, which they thought possible though not probable, would be if it came about? On that question absolutely different answers have been given by the Leader of the House and the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister says, "No, we had not the information." The Leader of the House says, "Yes, we had it." The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in the speech he made on Thursday last, said, "If there were miscalculation the Government were themselves deceived." The Leader of the House said, "We did know of the Boer armaments," and the Prime Minister said, "How on earth were we to know?" This question of information or misinformation of the Government also has a personal aspect. For between two and three months the most cruel attacks were made on Sir William Butler on this very point of the non-information of the Government, and it was said by almost every person and newspaper discussing the question that Sir William Butler was the person who should have given information to the Government, and that he had not given that information. That charge was made against him by a supporter of the Government—Lord Heneage—in terms which constituted, in fact, a charge of treason. The Under Secretary of State for War defended Sir William Butler in general terms.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. WYNDHAM, DOVER): Yes, early in October.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: Yes, but two months after the defence a Cabinet Minister used words which, if they had been taken apart from the previous charge, might pass as merely a party statement to a party meeting, but which I say, given the original charge and punctuated by the cheers of an excited meeting, were really as cruel an attack as any. The charge against Sir William Butler was, in fact, the charge of treason. It was the same charge on which I heard Marshal Bazaine condemned to death by a military court, presided over by the Duc d'Aumale at Versailles—the charge of preferring political to military considerations. I hope it may be taken now as admitted in this House that Sir William Butler is too great a general and too good a soldier to be guilty of the military crime of preferring political to military considerations. He was virtually removed from South Africa for political reasons; and using such means of information as I possess regarding the services of our generals, I should imagine that even from a military point of view that was one of the heaviest mistakes which the Government had made. The Prime Minister denied that the Government had the necessary information, and gave reasons—all sorts of reasons—which I do not wish to criticise, because there are circumstances which render it undesirable. The Leader of the House said that the "Intelligence Department was not guilty of under-estimating the military preparations of the Boers." His subsequent words show that he was referring to armaments and numbers. "There was no evidence," he says, "to show that they were wrong in any of their facts. They accurately estimated both number and armaments." The view of the Prime Minister is the exact contrary. He says, "We had no power of search," "We had not enough of secret service money," "Information is a matter of money, and of nothing else." We discussed the question of secret service money in this House a few years ago. The hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire, who made an admirable speech last night, will remember that discussion, in which he took part. We discussed the Intelligence Department from every point of view, and the almost universal opinion was that more money would be given by the House cheerfully if asked for by the Government, and any attack of reformers on the War Office was not aimed in that direction. I am not going to attack the War Office now, and I am glad my noble friend who initiated this debate did not do so. The War Office Vote will come up on a future occasion—this is the occasion for pressing home Cabinet responsibility. The Intelligence Department was always regarded as one of the branches of the War Office not adequately supplied with means, but on this occasion I venture to say—and I challenge the Under Secretary for War to deny it—that the Intelligence Department has admirably done its work. No Government was ever so well informed as to the resources of their opponents as the present Government in entering upon this war. There was every reason why the collection of information should be easy. The Boers had no sea-port, nothing could reach them except through our own territory or through Lorenzo Marques, where we have a consular agency. We had an agent at Pretoria. Mr. Conyngham Greene and also his locum tenens, Mr. Fraser, reported on these questions. No capitals are so easy of access as Pretoria and Bloemfontein. Special service officers were employed and sent out to make inquiry and to report. Mr. Phillips has shown that secrets are not well kept in Pretoria, and all the Transvaal military system was known to us in a way that very few military systems have been known. I fancy it is completely admitted that we knew of every gun and every pound of ammunition, but did we know the number of our opponents?

Some day the military history of this war will come to be written. It will not be like a Soudanese war; it will be a history in which the name of every man who has fought against us will be known. The field-state from day to day will be given. The commando system requires it. We know that system well, for it is actually in force in our own Cape Colony, where there is universal military service, and we have employed it in the native wars. I venture to say that there never was a war in which one side knew so accurately the numbers of its opponents as this war. The estimate of the number of Boers which could be put into the field, given in all the ordinary books of reference, was 49,000. I will challenge the Government. Did the man at the War Office who put the Boer numbers highest—the man most inclined to exaggerate—say that there are in arms against us, all included, 60,000 men? I do not think that the opinion that there are under 60,000 will be challenged by anyone who knows the facts. It is a matter of public knowledge that the books of reference gave 49,000; but conversations have got out, to which I will not further allude, that the War Office estimate of those who would join from our own colonies was 4,000. But the highest estimate I have heard, from the most competent soldiers, of the numbers which the Boers could place in the field against us was 59,000 men, although I believe that to be an extreme estimate by an extreme man. The Leader of the House takes a different line. He has said twice "We did under-estimate the military efficiency of the Boers." Now who is the "we"? "We" is the Cabinet, and I want to know on whose advice did the Cabinet under-estimate the military efficiency of the Boers? The Cabinet is responsible for the military under-estimate. The Cabinet chooses the generals; the generals do not choose themselves. The Cabinet choose the Commander-in-Chief and the most responsible military advisers of the time. Who were the persons who misled the Cabinet as to the military efficiency of the Boers? "If there were miscalculation," we are told, "the Government themselves were deceived," and that "the number of men" to be sent out to South Africa "was dictated solely by military advice." I want to know whether this was not military advice of military men misled by previous political miscalculation. At any rate, it is military advice for which the Cabinet are responsible, because they selected the men who gave it. I think I have established the reasons for the deficiency in the extent of the Cabinet's preparations for the war. But there is something to be said about the nature of their military preparations. Now, the Leader of the House has over and over again—here twice this session, and four times at Manchester—spoken of the intentions of the Government in a military sense as being the preparation in South Africa of a defensive force. I am not going to fall into the trap, I hope, of stating that a defensive force is a force that does not take the offensive, but the Leader of the House has stated that the Government policy was defensive.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In the first instance.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: The words the right hon. Gentleman used were—

"A force sufficient to defend the frontiers.
 . . . The defensive force was sent out.
 . . . Our hope was that the colonies would be fully defended by the force."

The policy, then, was a defensive policy in the first instance. During the recess Lord Salisbury and Lord Lansdowne spoke precisely to the same effect. They talked of "the interval before we were in strength" being "inevitable." I do not like that word "inevitable," but it runs through the Manchester speeches—everything was "inevitable," or due to "the hand of fate." "Inevitable" is the usual word when things go wrong with people by their own fault. I suppose the defensive policy was a policy of watching the frontiers. It was not a policy of falling back on the Tugela and abandoning the half of Natal to the enemy. There was a gross under-estimate of the military efficiency of our enemy, and therefore a belief that the frontiers of Natal could be held to the full extent by a force smaller than that which we were able to send there. The policy in Natal was defensive: that known to military writers as "the defensive in a theatre of operations in which no solution is intended." My contention is that every precaution recommended by every authority in such a case was neglected by the Cabinet, and I shall try to make that point clear to the House. Stores were accumulated at Dundee and Glencoe in holes, places easily commanded by artillery from the surrounding hills. Then, at Ladysmith, stores were accumulated on a gigantic scale, accumulated to a fabulous extent, also in another hole under easy artillery fire from hills all round—a position incredibly miscalculated for defence. Nothing was done which in the least contemplated, up to the last moment, the possibility of our having to fall back in the course of these defensive operations. The most ordinary precautions were neglected. Not a single gun of position or siege artillery was sent out to Natal. Garrison artillery were not sent out. Very small parties of engineers were sent out, but not numerous enough to complete entrenchments on a sufficient scale, capable of being defended by artillery. The destruction of the railways was neglected, so that the Boer Republics were able to bring down their heavy guns immediately and use them against us. Culverts and bridges were not blown up. There were special reasons why the tunnel at Laing's Nek was less important than is usual with tunnels, but there was all the greater necessity for blowing up the bridges. Bridges are even much more important in South Africa than here, because the rivers there rise and fall with extraordinary rapidity. The policy of the Government was defensive, but I do not believe that it was made clear to themselves or to the soldiers in the field; and there was overhanging all the extraordinary miscalculation of the fighting powers of the Boers. The Government sent as a defensive force a force of an ineffective offensive nature. The force was sent from India. We know that India is always prepared for war, as we are unprepared; and that Indian force contained its proper proportions of cavalry and artillery. They sent not a defensive force, but a force to fight the Boers in attack. They did not prepare for either a defensive or offensive war, but only a means of offensive war, which did not prove effective. There are some who argued that the war must have come some day and that it was wise to anticipate it. I will not discuss the policy of anticipating war so far as this country is concerned. It may be a wise policy in the case of countries which have but a single danger. France and Germany, as we know, both tried to anticipate war in 1869. But in our own country, with dangers in every portion of the world, if we tried to anticipate war we should never have peace. But if it was necessary to anticipate this war, which might come some day, the policy we should have required, was the rapid concentration of a great force for an advance upon and occupation of the capital of the enemy. Both by those who would have anticipated war and by the Government it has been alleged that the existence of a Parliamentary Opposition was the reason why the military precautions of the Government were inefficient. But the Government has been in power since July, 1895, and has been supported by overwhelming majorities, and it would have had the cheerful acquiescence of the House of Commons for every measure of military precaution, and all the military expenditure which was asked. The Cabinet are responsible, but if there is to be any difficulty on account of the existence of a constitutional Opposition—even a weak one—I say that by that doctrine we are fated to be beaten on every occasion we go to war. The time for the reform of our military system will come when this war has ended. We cannot reform it in a time of war. We have often addressed the House upon this subject. We preached to deaf ears. We were not listened to before war. Shall we be listened to when war is over? While I admit that in a time of war you cannot reform your military system, what you can do is to press home to the Cabinet the responsibility. The points upon which we have broken down have been those which have been put before the country time after time. We have broken down in staff and command, mounted branches—cavalry, artillery, and transport. In the October sitting a distinguished military Member drew attention to command, but said in this case it did not matter because we were only fighting Boers, but it would very materially affect us if we were fighting a Great Power; and Sir Redvers Buller put the same thing as succinctly as it could be put in the report issued to this House in 1898, in which he spoke of “a heterogeneous mass of units thrown together under commanders strange to them and strange to each other,” with “an improvised staff.” What Sir Redvers Buller had to use in 1897 he has again had provided for him on this occasion. With regard to the mounted branches, we have constantly brought the matter before the authorities, but in spite of that we have constantly diminished the number of trained horses in this country until, and this will not be denied, two years ago we had fewer trained horses by far than we had twenty-five years ago. With regard to the artillery, we are told in a book by Jomini that to a great enlightened manufacturing Power the perfecting of artillery gives very great advantage. "It is a blessing to an able Government. . . . a curse to a mediocre, ignorant or incapable one." A Commander-in-Chief has told us, and we were told yesterday that the Boers are an ignorant population. Well, they may be, but we have not found in this war that the great enlightened manufacturing Power has derived that advantage from "the perfecting of artillery" which Jomini tells us in his book we had every reason to expect. The Government in their defence of themselves have repudiated the idea that position guns, for example, ought to be employed in the field, but the Germans take position guns into the field at manoeuvres, and we talk of it now as if it was a new discovery. There are seven German army corps fully provided with field guns and position guns as well. All our artillery officers have told us that direct artillery fire has failed against the Boer entrenchments. We have known for years past that direct artillery fire would be likely to fail against strong entrenchments; yet we sent twenty-one batteries of field artillery to South Africa before the first one of three howitzer batteries was despatched. With regard to the number of guns, it has been one of our strongest charges against the War Office for some years that our Army is more insufficiently supplied with field artillery than any other Army in the world. Ours is not even comparable with the field artillery of Switzerland and Roumania. We have to point to countries who only spend half a million a year on armaments to get a comparison at all. In regard to our guns, the Leader of the House stated in a speech at Manchester that we had guns in South Africa sufficient "for three army corps of regular troops." I should like to know on whose authority the right hon. Gentleman made that statement. The first force sent to South Africa from India was supplied with guns—not on a Continental scale, but still in fairly decent and respectable measure. The forces of Lord Methuen and Sir Redvers Buller fall altogether short of even the scale adopted for the Indian contingent. Both these generals have themselves called attention to their deficiency in this respect. We have not even now got artillery on anything like the scale laid down by the right hon. Gentleman, and we could not have it in South Africa, because we have not got it in the world. In these circumstances I can only characterise the statement of the Leader of the House as entirely erroneous and misleading, and altogether a blunder. With regard to the batteries which are even now being sent out, many of them are manned by Reservists drawn from garrison artillery, who have had no experience in the handling of modern field guns. The First Lord of the Treasury at Manchester condescended to make a party attack over the question of our artillery. I hope he will agree with me that in all these matters I have never made a party speech, and I only make one now because I feel strongly on the subject. He said that all increases of efficiency in artillery had been carried out by Conservative Governments. As a matter of fact the present Government was in office for two and a half years before it turned its attention to the artillery. It then proposed an increase of a single battery. A year later it proposed a further increase, which was on a very feeble scale in comparison with any other Power, and even that increase had not been attained when the present war broke out. Does the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord remember what occurred to the artillery at the time when Mr. Stanhope was Secretary of State for War? Mr. Stanhope, as the House knows perfectly well, made a reduction in the Horse Artillery which has never been compensated for by any increase in the Field Artillery. In these circumstances it is bitterly to be regretted that the Leader of the House should have sought to make party capital out of our artillery deficiency. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR expressed dissent.] What complaint was the right hon. Gentleman going to make?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My only complaint is that I thought at a time when a vote of censure was being proposed on the Government it would not be going beyond the ordinary practices of controversy to say that not a few of the difficulties in which we have been placed have arisen through the fault of our predecessors.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I do not see the precise bearing of that interruption, since Mr. Edward Stanhope was a member of the Conservative party. With regard to cavalry as with regard to artillery, the first force was well supplied, but the forces of Lord Methuen and General Buller are very deficient in that respect. In that connection the First Lord also made an attack on the critics of the War Office. He said they had not seen, or if they had seen had not insisted on, a novel fact in the present war, namely, that for the first time in the history of the world they had an enemy entirely mounted. I have two or three remarks to make upon that statement. One is that it has happened before. One has to read Sir William Butler's book on the life of General Sir George Pomeroy Colley to recall the facts. Apart from that, the First Lord attacks the critics. The critics have failed to see, or if they have not failed they have not insisted, that the War Office should have seen to it. It is not the duty of the responsible Ministry for the moment, says the First Lord. The Defence Committee of the Cabinet, of which the right hon. Gentleman is a member, is a body which we admit has failed. I believe that the correspondence in which my hon. friend the Member for Belfast, Sir George Chesney, Mr. Spenser Wilkinson, and I took part had something to do with the formation of the Committee. The Committee was created by Lord Rosebery's Government, and was like any other Cabinet Committee. Under the present Government, its acts have been proclaimed to the world; but, although I may be looked upon as a critical sort of person, I distinctly state that it has failed, and the failure is due to what we call, in these slang days, a slackness on the part of those who attend to the work which devolves upon them. It has not been worked as an effective instrument might have been worked in the interests of the country. That Committee, or the Cabinet as a whole, ought to have foreseen such a contingency as the need for mounted men, which the critics either did not or could not insist upon. The soldiers, whose opinions one would have thought worth having, did foresee it. I have not the same means of judging as the Cabinet have, nor have I the knowledge of what the best men in the army thought on this occasion; but I should have thought that a paper read by a very distinguished officer might have reached the Government. He is on active service now, so he cannot write to the papers on the subject. I mean Colonel Spence. He is at this moment Deputy Adjutant General at Malta. He was present at the Amberley manœuvres directed by Sir William Butler in 1896; and Colonel Spence was the man who designed those most elaborate and successful manœuvres, which were on a great scale. He was chief of the staff of Sir William Butler, and undoubtedly he possessed Sir William's confidence. Although differences have arisen between Sir Alfred Milner and Sir William Butler, the fact is that Sir William Butler's opinion was known to the Government, and the information we had was not made a matter of concealment when Sir Alfred was in this country some months ago. My information may be defective, but what I have heard is that Sir William Butler had said that 60,000 men would be required in Cape Colony, and 25,000 men in Natal. Those are the numbers which have reached me in private conversation, and which reached me at the time. I may say that Sir William Butler has never opened his mouth so far as I am concerned. The information reached me at the time these statements were made to Sir Alfred Milner, and since this matter has become acute, and since Sir William Butler has been withdrawn he has kept his mouth shut. In that lecture by Colonel Spence, which was delivered in July of last year—it was called "South Africa," and was a military lecture delivered in a military institution—he made use of these words, and it appears to have been common knowledge—

"The Boers are mounted infantry, well armed with weapons of precision, and are grand shots. They ride up to the point they wish to defend . . . then dismount, fight on foot with their horses near and ready for the next movement . . . They have the ubiquity of cavalry and the repelling power of infantry."

He goes on to point out the conditions necessary to meet a military power of that kind. Now what was the attitude of the Cabinet on this point? The Cabinet telegraphed to the Colonies refusing mounted men; and they gave their reasons in that telegram of October 3rd, namely, that "in view of the numbers already available" infantry were the most and "cavalry least serviceable." Now we well know, and it has been justly complained of, that the number of cavalry in South Africa with Lord Methuen and Sir Redvers Buller are clearly inadequate. And this on the top of our declaration that mounted men from the Colonies were not to be sent. Then followed that telegram on the 16th December: "Mounted men preferred." That is to say, after all this loss of life has been incurred, after all these reverses to our arms—call them checks if you will; I say they are reverses—they have discovered what competent soldiers have told them all along, that mounted men were essential for a service of this kind. I confess I cannot but think that if the value of the mounted men is as great as we have been told it is by the Government within the last few days, the arrival of mounted men used to the field and to shooting—the arrival of these men in due time, I say, might have turned the scale in many portions of the field of war. Now, Sir, just one other remark and I have done. For some years past there have been discussions as to Empire expansion which have divided some of us from others on military questions. There are some of us who are strong supporters of the Government in preparing for war in the present situation of the world, who are not in favour of what is called the expansion of the Empire. We have resisted it because we believed the military requirements of the Empire were greater—as it was put by Lord Charles Beresford, whom we see here no longer—than we were prepared to meet. And the Government now come down to the House and quietly tell us that that is so. They have put it in the Queen's Speech. We have it stated that although the money we have to spend in military preparations is more than that of any other Power in the world, we are going to be asked to spend more. I should hope that good may come out of evil, and that a result of this sad war may be the proper utilisation of our resources in preparing, in times of peace, all the military forces of what people call Greater Britain. I repeat that I hope good will come of it. But the fact remains that the money we spend on our land forces is enormous, and the use we have made of that money up to the present time, and in the conduct of this campaign, appears to me deplorable. In 1887 I ventured to assert that we were trained in a school of "luck and pluck." But that system has become more and more out of touch with the march of events. Then, the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has said—

"If there are faults they are faults of the head, not of the heart. The Government did not go into the war with a light heart."

In 1856, when Prussia had a just cause of quarrel with a Swiss canton, Moltke went to Switzerland and saw for himself the preparations that were being made. When he came back the Prussians did not fight. They concluded a Treaty in 1857 instead. I am not drawing a political analogy; but I venture to say that the Government went into this war without the preparation they should have made. Their neglect of that precaution has brought about the reverses we have met with, and the natural consequence is the failure of our arms I have described. As regards the Crimean War, which in some respects has been compared with this, one is reminded of the present Commander-in-Chief, who has written these momentous words: The history of the Crimean War shows

"Now an army may be destroyed by a Ministry through want of ordinary forethought."

I confess that I think there is only one point in which the two cases are exactly parallel—for there are many distinctions between them—and that is in the heroism of officers and men.

MR. WYNDHAM: The right hon. Baronet began his able speech by assuring us that the country takes an interest in this debate. I differ from him at the very outset. I am not at all certain that the country does take an interest in this debate as a whole. I am not at all sure that the country will take an interest in the whole of the right hon. Baronet's speech. It will take an interest in the latter part; it will read with absorbing interest everything he has said about guns, mounted troops, and the proportion of cavalry—in fact, whenever he touched on questions of military defence he will be read with the attention and interest which his known knowledge of these matters commands and deserves. But I am not so sure that that interest will be commanded by the earlier part of his speech. I am not so sure that the country cares very much for this Amendment, which consists of two halves, the relevancy of which the one to the other is not easy to follow. The point of the first part of the right hon. Baronet's speech was, if I am not mistaken, that he wished to drive home the question of Government responsibility. Was it necessary to detain the House twenty-five or thirty minutes in making that point? We freely accept that responsibility. I have never spoken since the war began without openly stating that the Government, and the Government alone, were responsible for everything connected with the war. I went out of my way early in October, when attacks were made on Sir William Butler and the Intelligence Department, to say that, when once the country was at war, the Government and only the Government could be held responsible. If any other views are insidiously introduced for our acceptance—and there are some who try to introduce them—we shall be dealing a lamentable blow at the constitutional fabric of this country, and I will never be a party to endeavouring to take off one feather-weight of responsibility from the Cabinet of this country in connection with military administration. I stated that as strongly as I could in June, 1895, and I am prepared to repeat the words I used on that occasion. Then, the right hon. Baronet took the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs to task for having, in a speech he recently delivered, stated that the Government had acted in every particular upon "military advice." Why did my right hon. friend make that statement?—not in order to shift any responsibility from the Government, which, if a war is successful, gets undue praise, and, if a war is disastrous, gets undue blame, morally and eternally, but constitutionally, gets its deserts—my right hon. friend said that to remove a doubt which was breeding anxiety in the public mind. The public, who wish that our generals should have unfettered discretion in the field, had been misinformed and led to believe that our generals' decisions were being overridden and guided by the Cabinet, and they were doubtful, therefore, as to what the future development of the war might be. Surely it was the right, almost the duty, of any member of the Government to remove that doubt. After the earlier part of the right hon. Baronet's speech, he said he would proceed to a concentration upon facts, and I then hoped he was going at once to arrive at those arguments which he afterwards put with so much force. But the first fact to which the right hon. Baronet invited our attention was not connected with military defence; it was simply connected more or less with the diplomatic arguments which have been involved. He told us it was a matter of common notoriety that there had been an alliance between the Orange Free State and the Transvaal Republic for many years; indeed, I think he said since within a few months of the Jameson raid.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: Since 1889.

MR. WYNDHAM: The right hon. Baronet is generally very accurate as to his facts, but I think he has not distinguished very clearly on this occasion that that alliance was explicitly and in terms a defensive alliance only, and placed no obligation upon a single man in the Orange Free State unless the frontier of one or other of the Dutch Republics had been crossed by a hostile force. But another alliance was made at a later date. On September 27 last year words were used by President Steyn which showed that that alliance had been superseded by another, which would admit of the inhabitants of the Free State taking offensive action with the inhabitants of the Transvaal. Therefore, the First Lord of the Treasury was not so very far out in the limit of time which he made use of in his speech at Dewsbury when he said that two months ago he should not have dreamt that the Orange Free State would have acted as it had. He was naming almost to a day the date when the Orange Free State undertook this additional obligation. The right hon. Baronet next said that this was not an occasion for attacking the War Office, and that hitherto he had not made a party speech when directing his knowledge and ability to questions of military defence. But he went on to say that on this occasion his feelings were so strong that he was bound to make a party

speech, and as I understood, and as I infer, he was bound to vote for this party amendment. The feelings of the right hon. Baronet may be strong, but I know they are not stronger than the feelings of almost every inhabitant of this country, and I beg leave to tell him that because of the very strength of those feelings many men in this House and many millions outside believe that that strength of feeling ought to lead to an avoidance of party spirit rather than to a feeding of it. The latter half of the right hon. Baronet's speech was welcome to the majority of men in this House, not, perhaps, entirely for its trend as a criticism of the War Office, but because of the subject-matter which he elected to handle, and with the latter part of that speech I would couple the admirable speeches to which we listened yesterday from the Members for West Somersetshire and the Rye Division of Sussex. A few days ago I could have said with absolute confidence that we had met to hear speeches of that kind. They were the speeches the country was expecting. It is true in this House, as elsewhere, that the unexpected always happens. But eight or ten days ago I never anticipated that such an Amendment as this would be moved. I never for one moment believed that such an attack would be delivered from such a quarter at such a time. What is the time? We are in the midst of the most anxious stage of a war which is filling the breasts of all our countrymen with poignant emotion, and which is taxing even their splendid qualities of stoical endurance. That is the time. What is the quarter? This attack is delivered by right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench, who, next to the Government of the day, are under the most onerous obligations to the whole country to avoid any course which may embarrass our arms—any course which may add to the anxiety only too naturally felt by those who watch the efforts of our brave soldiers upon the field. And, Sir, without exception, all these right hon. Gentlemen, not even excepting the late Leader of the Opposition or the right hon. Member for the Montrose Burghs, have stated that they are in accord with us, at any rate as to the immediate necessity and immediate objects of the war. Now, what is the nature of the attack? The attack is not merely a technical vote of censure put up as a peg upon which you may hang an interesting debate, but an explicit vote of censure drawn in such terms as to mean nothing unless it means that right hon. Gentlemen opposite are prepared now to unite and take over this heavy task from our hands with a greater hope of prosecuting it successfully, because they have now more knowledge and more foresight and more judgment than the members of the Government themselves. I will not insult them by believing that they have been guilty of so futile and, at this moment, so frivolous a course of action as to put forward this Amendment merely to record their opinion that they would have shown more knowledge and judgment and foresight.

AN HON. MEMBER OF THE OPPOSITION: They could not have less.

MR. WYNDHAM: It must mean that they think their superiority in these respects would counterbalance the obvious and admitted disadvantages of a Ministerial crisis and a general election half way through a war which is racking the whole Empire. Then, consider the different points of view of these right hon. Gentlemen who now think they may unite for such a difficult purpose. I am not going to touch on the diplomatic side of the Amendment. It does not interest me. But on the question of military preparation, which does interest me, we have had the same divergence of opinion. The hon. Member for Berwick has urged that our fault was in not sending out troops at a sufficiently early date. On the other hand, the Leader of the Opposition said in this House only the other night and, more explicitly, some months ago, that our fault was that all through last summer we were mixing up diplomacy with military preparations. That is a grave charge, because, if true, it would shatter the basis of the Government's defence of its action in the past. But the Leader of the Opposition has been completely misled. He has twice made this charge without any basis of fact whatever. I do not know how he came to make it. I was questioned last summer by the hon. Member for East Mayo on that very point, and I informed the House most explicitly that not a single man had been added to the establishment of the garrison in South Africa until late in the month of September. The charge ought not to have been made, and I think it should be withdrawn. I regret the line the Opposition have taken, and to which we are invited by the terms of the Amendment. I do not wish to pursue it. I believe that all that can be said about defects in the past is but as dust in the balance in comparison with those things that have to be done, that must be done, to meet the demands of the future. In ordinary times, no doubt, it is the right and duty of the Opposition to oppose, to question, to criticise, to review, to condemn, if you like, a Government or a Government department, and that places on the department a corresponding obligation to defend itself. But this is not an ordinary time, and I hoped and honestly believed that we should have suspended our sham fights in face of the deadly reality; that our animosities would have been hushed in common sorrow for those who have fallen, in sympathy for those who are bereaved, and admiration for our gallant soldiers who daily and nightly are enduring hardships and incurring danger, in order to ensure the general safety of the State. But we have been deceived in that hope. My duty to the House, as I had conceived it, was not so much to defend the War Office as to explain what had been done, and why it had been done, and if such a course, tame in comparison with what has taken place within the last few days, has any interest in any quarter of the House I still propose to follow it. In considering what steps have been taken, the reasons for taking them, and the reasons for not taking some of them sooner, I agree we ought frankly and fearlessly to score up against the War Office or the Army any disappointment and reverse that can be traced to defect in administration in the one or the other; but I do not think it is wise to attribute to defects in the War Office or the Army consequences which have followed from our settled scheme of military defence, or consequences which have followed the diplomatic policy which the Government adopted—rightly adopted, as I think, in view of the peculiar relations between this country, the two Dutch Republics, and our colonies in South Africa. If we set down to the one or the other disappointments that spring from other causes, we shall cloud our judgment, which we need to keep clear in order that we may consider proposals for the reform of our system of defence which are in the air, and some of which at no distant date it will be my duty to lay before the House. Let me take the first point. Let us consider what is the permanent system of military defence in this country. It is no use to say, "You have no troops left in this country," for that is not quite true; and it is no use charging the War Office with the fact that if you send an army to South Africa it no longer remains in England. We must face things as they are. It may be we shall have to make changes in our system of military defence, but let us understand the system. It has been said by some critics that our military defence is at a disadvantage as compared with our naval defence, because the Navy has always an objective to aim at. That is to say, it has been taken as a rule that our naval strength should be equal to the combined strength of any two Powers. We have had an objective in our minds in connection with military defence ever since Mr. Stanhope was Secretary of State for War in 1888. The Army of this country has been organised and maintained with a view to achieving three objects—to give the necessary draft reliefs to our army in India and for the maintenance of our colonial garrisons, to be equal to the embodiment of three army corps for home defence, and, as I have put it a fortiori, to be capable of embodying into two army corps a cavalry division and troops of the Line for communication for the purposes of a foreign expedition. I do not believe that the critics of this or any other Government have contemplated a higher objective than that. I do not think the right hon. Baronet who has spoken this evening does—I have read his book on the subject—though he puts in another point, which I think is covered by what I have said, that we might have, under certain conditions, to considerably augment our garrisons in India.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I have also recommended a much larger force of artillery.

MR. WYNDHAM: I shall have something to say about guns later on. But nobody has urged that our military system ought to provide us troops in larger numbers than those which I have named; therefore, if you want to know where it has failed—for I admit there has been a defect, and I am not here to maintain that the War Office is impeccable—we must know what are the troops necessary for such an expedition. It has been computed at fifty-eight battalions of infantry, ten regiments of cavalry, and that you would need, if you compute the higher proportion of artillery recognised by experts last year, forty-two batteries of artillery. I do not think the right hon. Baronet would wish us to have more with such a force.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: No, not with such a force. I do not like to interrupt, but as the question is put to me, I may say I have advocated keeping up artillery in addition to the artillery for the regular forces; that is to say, to correspond with the strength of Regulars, Militia, and Volunteers.

MR. WYNDHAM: That is a question I hope to deal with at a future date; but I do not think the right hon. Baronet, and certainly no German authority, would recommend sending more than forty-two batteries with such a force. Well, we have sent almost the whole of that number out of this country. I draw a distinction between what is sent out from the country and what we have concentrated in South Africa. It would not be fair in this argument to quote all the troops we have in South Africa. Instead of fifty-eight battalions of infantry we have sent sixty. We have failed in cavalry, I admit; instead of ten we have sent nine regiments; but instead of forty-two batteries of artillery we have sent forty-six from this country, and I do not think the failure of one in ten ought to press hard against the system. There are concentrated in South Africa fifteen regiments of cavalry, and we are going to send three more. There will be seventy-six battalions of regular infantry, and in all fifty-four batteries of artillery. This could not have been done unless this Government, unless my noble friend Lord Lansdowne and the Commander-in-Chief had worked with unceasing energy since they took office in 1895 to make the home establishment rise to the objective which I have named. What is the work that has been done since 1895? We have raised and added six battalions of infantry to the home establishment. We have voted more, and shall now raise them. We have raised and added sixteen batteries of artillery to the establishment. The right hon. Baronet says he has urged us again and again to make a larger addition, but he knows the difficulties we have to encounter, and that what has been easy recently because of the patriotism of the country was not easy last year. The pace at which we sought to raise the batteries was estimated on the best advice we could get and according to our experience of recruiting in the country. We knew that it was impossible in ordinary times to raise more than five batteries of artillery in the year, and we raised them at that pace, and when the war came we had raised two of the five proposed for this year, and then when war came we raised the remaining three without the slightest difficulty. Such is the patriotism of the nation. The difficulty of every Government is that, though an Englishman will fight for his country with greater readiness than any other man, he is not so fond of soldiering as the people of other nations. If I am not wearying the House with details, I will ask Members to consider the increase in the effective strength of the Army since we accepted this mark to aim at in 1888. On October 1 in that year the effective strength—men actually in the Army and serving with the colours—was 210,717. On October 1 last, before we called out the Reserves, there were 235,924, an increase in our peace Army of 25,207. Now, it has been said—and I must call attention to this point—that this has been done by robbing the reserves and the militia, but that is not quite the case. The reserves in 1888 were 51,174, and on October 1 last they stood at 81,133, a further increase of 29,959 men. The militia, I regret to say, has fallen below the establishment, and I hope it may be possible to devise some means to remedy this. It has fallen in that period 10,250 men below the establishment. But even so there is a net gain of 15,000 to the peace establishment of the British Army, and 10,000 men are admittedly more efficient than they would have been in the militia, because after all a regular battalion is better than a militia battalion, largely because its officers have greater opportunities and longer training and service. Then as to arms. We have armed in this period the regulars and militia with the newest rifle—the Lee-Metford—

and we so armed the Volunteers—I do not wish to make a party point at all—between the years 1895-97 at a much more rapid rate than was anticipated by the leader of the Opposition, who in the celebrated cordite debate, when he was Secretary for War, anticipated that it would be necessary largely to increase the amount of cordite kept in store if in the course of some years Volunteers were armed with the Lee-Metford rifle. Well, we did it in the course of one year. I say that not to make a party point, but merely to show that this Government has not been, as some think, slack and idle in what is after all one of the first and most vital duties of a Government of this nation. The difficulty in this country is not by merely passing a vote to get men: you have to find the land on which to train them, and barracks in which to house them. All these problems present greater difficulties in this small country, where property is not only expensive, but where it is reluctantly surrendered, where you have to fight lawsuits and put compulsory powers in force, and where you are impeded at every turn by the very men—to whom be all honour and credit—who now in the moment of difficulty will write a cheque for £10,000 or £50,000. We have spent on training—that is to say, on putting barracks in the neighbourhood of places where men can be trained—£1,399,000; we have spent on concentration—that is to say, on building barracks where the different units of brigades and so forth can be placed—altogether £5,555,000; we have spent on increasing the comfort of the troops, by improving the amenities of these barracks, £6,338,000; and because we have done that we have made some progress with the hardest problem of all, namely, the problem of recruiting. The recruits who came into the Army in 1895, the first year of this Government, numbered 29,583, and the recruits last year were 42,700. On works and on guns we have spent, and partly contracted by loans—I put loans and Estimates together—£7,000,000; and if you take all the money which has been contracted for on loans since the days of Lord Palmerston you will find that this Government and its predecessors have contracted £16,000,000, out of £19,500,000. I think it is not fair to say that we were found, by what I admit to be a great Imperial emergency, wanting in having done what was possible in this country at a time when no man's mind was turned towards war or the disastrous events which have fallen to our lot during the last three months. I will not say another word about what is called the permanent military policy of this country; I have shown its limitations, but I have tried also to show that, accepting those limitations, this Government has done its best to extend that military system during a period of profound crisis. It is necessary in order to meet some of the criticisms of the right hon. Baronet, and in order to explain what has taken place, to say one word upon diplomacy, because, although when diplomacy breaks down and war ensues the conduct of affairs can be put into the hands of generals, and their action can be released from all guidance and restriction, so long as diplomacy is in the field war-like preparations must have some relation to that diplomacy. I am not going through the history of the tangled skein of the diplomatic negotiations of last year. I am content to take one thing—the ultimatum. On September 8th we sent a despatch to the Transvaal Government which practically amounted to this, Will you or will you not allow us to examine your seven years franchise law? If you will allow it, and if that law is proved to be unsatisfactory and illusory, how can you recede from your offer of a five years franchise? Well, was that a moment for ostentatiously spending three or four millions of money on preparations which would have been known to the whole world within a few days? Could we honestly have taken such a course? Is it true that there was no chance for diplomacy at that moment? Why, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Montrose Burghs a week after that despatch said that in his judgment the Transvaal Government could not and would not recede from their five years offer.

MR. J. MORLEY (Montrose Burghs).—I think the hon. Gentleman has not quite accurately reported the despatch of 8th September. The effect of that despatch was to confine the Boers to their five years franchise.

MR. WYNDHAM: The right hon. Gentleman has left out the invitation at the beginning of that despatch to have an examination of the seven years law to see whether it was satisfactory. I will not go into that. I believe I have given it accurately; but, whether I have or not, it will not, I think, be denied that it would have been a doubtful policy, it would have been the very course of which we have been erroneously accused by the Leader of the Opposition, if we had spent £3,000,000 prior to that date on collecting mules and heaping up munitions and stores in South Africa. I wonder whether any hon. Gentleman who says, Why did not you collect mules in South Africa? can picture what 18,000 or 20,000 mules look like when they are all together. They are not what can be called "common objects of the seashore," they are conspicuous and would be bound to attract attention. I have seen myself the collective transport for a far smaller force than the one we contemplated, and I can assure hon. Members that it is not the kind of thing that anyone is likely to overlook. I believe that a good deal of this criticism of the Government for not collecting a vast amount of stores and a number of transport animals—the only things that could have been done at an earlier date, and which, if they had been done, could only have given us an extra four weeks in hand—is based upon a study of the problem which confronts Continental nations, but which does not confront ourselves. As between two sovereign States on the Continent of Europe, it is perfectly true that no statesmen would conduct a prolonged diplomatic correspondence of the character which took place between this country and the Transvaal last year, or any long and strained diplomatic correspondence, unless they had—as a matter of fact Continental nations always have—their armies on the frontier ready to be mobilised, with huge reserves of stores and transports available within from two to four days call. But that is not the problem which this Government has dealt with successfully for something like a hundred years in South Africa, and successfully for a far longer period in India. This country, which in these vast expanses is sovereign over certain portions of the territory, which holds other tracts in the state of feudatories, and over others, again, exercises a shadowy supremacy, is responsible for the general welfare of the whole of these great expanses and their happiness. How have we fulfilled that responsibility? How have we been able, with a few vicissitudes, some almost as alarming as this one, to do this? Partly by our arms, partly by the prestige of our arms, but, in my judgment, far more largely because we have not pursued methods which may be appropriate to the Continent, but which are not appropriate to such places as South Africa and India. Can anybody believe that the great feudatory rajahs of India would at this moment be offering us their horses and their men if they had not known that we never prepared a blow whilst we maintained a smiling face, if they had not known that we have never made ready to wipe out a State, however difficult it made our path, until we had given it warning after warning, and perhaps in the long run allowed it to find us in the very state, I admit of unpreparedness, in which we were found by this war with the Transvaal? That may provoke dissent, but I invite hon. Members to read the correspondence recently published in the life of Sir Robert Peel in connection with the Sikh War of 1845. They will find there a parallel so close to what has just happened as to be absolutely startling. Lord Ellenborough had been recalled. He wrote in a letter to the Viceroy-designate, Lord Hardinge, that an invasion by the Sikhs was inevitable. Lord Hardinge went out to India, and he wrote home taking an entirely different opinion. Matters became worse, and we made then, as we made now, a defensive preparation. Then, suddenly, came the invasion by the Sikhs with 65,000 men and 150 pieces of artillery. Did Lord Hardinge, whose memory I believe all men respect, and who showed such heroism and such statesmanship on that occasion, say then, "I have been wrong, you have been wrong, and we ought to have made ready a great offensive expedition preparatory to crossing the border?" No, he wrote these words—

Third Day.

"The Sikh aggression was made when we were prepared with defensive means. That we were not prepared, for want of transport, with offensive means is no fault of this Government: it would have justified hostilities and placed us in the wrong."

I need hardly say that I do not intend to ride off upon that argument and to avoid any attacks or criticism which can properly be brought to bear upon the adequacy and, above all, upon the timeliness of our preparations. I hope the House will understand that I do not.

object to criticism on these points; I welcome it, I do not consider it hostile, I think it helpful to the Government, because unless we search most deeply and curiously into all these military questions we cannot hope to turn to the best account the patriotic feeling which is aroused and our intention to better our defences in the future. What were the preparations which were made? The garrison of South Africa stood at seven battalions of infantry, two regiments of cavalry, and three batteries of artillery. For the defensive state we increased that garrison up to seventeen battalions of infantry, five regiments of cavalry, and nine batteries of artillery, or something approaching 25,000 men in all. I can only say that it was believed—I admit erroneously, and I regret it—that that force was sufficient for defensive action. The facts have proved the contrary—the hard logic of facts. We accept that, but, believing that that force was sufficient for defensive action, the Government prepared an expeditionary force. The Government knew it would take thirteen weeks from the date of the commencement of the preparations which take longest to the day of their completion. Those things were the change of draught to suit mules instead of horses, the purchase of mules in different parts of the world and their concentration in South Africa, and so forth. But there was no doubt about it, if we did wrong, we did it deliberately, from what I believe to have been a right motive—namely, to give diplomacy every chance. And we did not do it recklessly, because we believed the defensive action we took was sufficient to avoid any risk involved in that delay. Once we began to send that force we proceeded with great rapidity. The embarkation began on October 20th, and by the 31st we had embarked 27,000 men, 3,600 horses, and 42 guns. By December 4th we had in South Africa 47,000 men. It has been said that we have sent men out by dribbets, but that is not so. In every week a considerable number of men were landed in South Africa without a single pause or intermission. I will not stop to give the numbers now; if any Member wishes for a return I am ready to publish them. I may tell the House that you cannot embark beyond a certain number of men in any week in this country, because there are not the quays beside which you can put more than a certain number of ships, and, even if you could, I invite hon. Members to give their attention to the problem of coaling all those ships at intermediate stations on the way out, and then you will find that the volume of the stream which you can turn upon any part of the world 7,000 miles away is determined by certain physical factors that no amount of goodwill can overcome. The fact that all the stores and all the transport for the whole force originally contemplated, its eight regiments of cavalry and its artillery, could not be ready until, say, December 20th, was no reason for not sending out the infantry at a far earlier date. We have been somewhat inconsistently attacked by some for not sending out the infantry in order to keep the peace in districts which might be suspected of disloyalty, and by others for sending out troops in wrong order—namely, infantry first, and cavalry last; but, as I have said, as the whole force could not be operative, had not its legs, and was not expected to have its legs, until December 20th, it was a very sound thing to send the infantry out as a stationary garrison during a time of so much danger and anxiety. That was the situation and that was the view which, rightly or wrongly, was taken of it by the Government. But on 30th October the whole problem was changed, and on 2nd November Sir R. Buller announced to the Government that he intended to proceed himself at once to the relief of Ladysmith. Now, Sir, that is the second of the two cardinal decisions upon which everything has hinged. The first, as I have already said, was the diplomatic decision not to make ostentatious preparations for aggressive action so long as diplomacy held out any hope; the second was the strategic decision of 2nd November, which consisted in this, that the transport for one organic force which was maturing and which would have matured by the third week of December was broken up and diverted into another country, you may say four days' steaming away, and some of the troops who were concentrated there were diverted in a similar manner. Do not suppose for a moment that I am criticising the decision of Sir R. Buller. Far from it. He was on the spot. He saw the facts as they were, and I have no doubt he will be able to give reasons for that action which will convince military students and the country. I do not criticise his action. I think we have too much of this kind of criticism. People say that, instead of proceeding with a central advance, Sir R. Buller went to relieve Ladysmith, and we know what happened. Quite true. A good many things we will call disastrous if you like; things we shall never forget and shall ever regret to our dying day have happened. But we do not know, and none of us ever can or will know, what would have happened if another course had been pursued. There is a tendency to which we are all subject—I know I am—that when you have two choices and you choose one which turns out to be unfortunate and you are overwhelmed with disappointment, you assume that if you had taken the other decision all would have gone well. But it is very easy to conceive that if Sir R. Buller had not gone to the relief of Ladysmith, and if Sir G. White had not stayed in Ladysmith, we might have had another development of disaster upon another line. We might have had that universal rising of the Cape Dutch of which we have heard for months, but which, thank Heaven! has not occurred. That explanation—I will not call it “that defence”—also, in my opinion, accounts for the fact that Lord Methuen had not sufficient cavalry and artillery with him. Lord Methuen was hurried up after the reverse at Nicholson's Nek to the Orange River, and when we are accused of having been tardy, as far as I remember, if you deduct the time for the sea voyage, Lord Methuen, who left London, arrived on the frontier (that is to say, the Orange River) in fewer days than the German Army reached the French frontier in the Franco-German war. Naturally, the plan of campaign having been changed, he had not with him the cavalry which had been diverted for another purpose. When this happened, my noble friend the Secretary of State at once offered a Fifth Division to Sir R. Buller. It has been said that when somebody was asked for a battalion he always sent a brigade, and that has been the course pursued by Lord Lansdowne. On the morrow of Nicholson's Nek he at once despatched three battalions, although none were asked for. On the morrow of the decision of Sir R. Buller he at once offered him a Fifth Division, and in reply he was told that preparation was desirable, but that there was no immediate need for its despatch. Then later on, it was asked for—on the 11th. On November 30th, and again on December 9th, he offered to send out a Sixth Division, and the reply was that it would be wanted at the end of January. Then again the situation changed, owing to reverses. On the 18th there was a reverse at Stormberg, and on the 11th Lord Methuen's attack at Magersfontein was defeated with heavy loss. On the 13th Sir R. Buller was about to make a frontal attack on the position at Colenso. The next day—the 14th—Lord Lansdowne ordered the Sixth Division to embark without any communication with South Africa, and they began to embark two days afterwards. At the same time he ordered the Seventh Division to be mobilised. Then on 15th December Sir R. Buller met with what I will not call a reverse, but a distinct check, at the battle of Colenso—strategically most critical, but as an affair of arms, glorious for our soldiers. The next day he asked for a Seventh Division, the preparation of which had already been ordered, and also for 8,000 mounted irregulars from this country. Lord Lansdowne replied that the Seventh Division would embark on the 4th of January, and it did begin to embark on the 4th of January. The next day we took the first steps to bring out the Imperial Yeomanry. At the same time the Volunteers were invited to come forward—as I should like to explain—in order to fill up the places in each battalion left vacant by the raising of one company of mounted infantry from each battalion. We also appealed to the patriotism of our Militia regiments. Twenty Militia regiments are now serving, or are about to proceed, out of this country, and fourteen of them are serving in South Africa.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Give the proportions for the three portions of the United Kingdom.

MR. WYNDHAM: I have not the proportions with me.

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER: The Irish are best.

MR. WYNDHAM: I do not think I should be entitled to make any further demand on the patience of the House. If the point is raised as to the efficiency of our field artillery, I shall be prepared to meet it.

AN HON. MEMBER: Are they quick-firers?

MR. WYNDHAM: The matter is too technical to be taken up at this moment. But as the right hon. Baronet has pressed me, not upon the efficiency of the guns, but on the numbers of the guns we have despatched, it would perhaps not be out of place to state exactly what guns we have sent out. We have sent and are sending 36 siege train guns, heavy guns, and we have there 38 naval guns, mobile heavy guns—that, is to say, 74 heavy guns of position. In addition we have 36 5in. howitzers which are moved about with the troops, and which throw a very heavy shell, with 50lb. of lyddite. So that, altogether, we have 110 guns capable of throwing a large shell with a high explosive, and some of them with a range of 10,000 yards. Then we have 54 guns of horse artillery and 234 guns of field artillery, or 288 field guns with the troops.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: That is including those which have not yet sailed?

MR. WYNDHAM: No doubt; I admitted that that was the case. In all, counting in the howitzers, there can accompany the troops in the field 324 guns. There are also two mountain batteries, or, in all, 410 guns in South Africa, without counting the guns which are to go out with the Volunteers and the guns from our colonies. If the right hon. Baronet likes to make a point of it, 18 of these guns are not there yet.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: A great deal more than that, surely. You are counting all those batteries—those scratch batteries—which sailed on the 21st January.

MR. WYNDHAM: I do not know what the right hon. baronet means by "scratch" batteries. Four batteries have recently been despatched, and I told him that some of the siege train guns were not yet in South Africa. The right hon. Baronet pressed me for answers upon the question of mounted troops. It is a question which I am very glad to explain, and I propose to explain it quite frankly to the House. It has been said that the Government announced to the world their conviction that unmounted troops were the kind of troops which were most suited to South African warfare. The words "unmounted troops" were not used. The correct phrase was used by the right hon. Baronet this evening; but I do not insist upon that. Those who quote these words should consider when they were used, and to whom they were used. If they will consider that, they will find that they gave no indication that the Government held the opinion to which I have referred. It may be, and I think it is, that the Government did not send out originally a sufficient proportion of mounted troops; but they sent out a larger proportion than is usually contemplated, because they believed that mounted troops were specially suited to South African warfare. They sent out a cavalry division with one army corps, and they ordered one company of mounted infantry to be raised in connection with each battalion sent to South Africa. Therefore the necessity for mounted troops was present to their minds—I do not say sufficiently present to their minds; but when did they use these words, that infantry was most serviceable? On the 3rd of October, before the ultimatum had been sent and before the war had begun, and at a time when the Government and the general officer who was going out to command in South Africa, Sir Redvers Buller, were satisfied that the force of the army corps and the cavalry division and the troops on the lines of communication was an adequate force—that is to say, 50,000 men, in addition to the 25,000 in South Africa. Then came up the question of colonial contingents. Two colonies, and two only, before the 3rd of October, had made a definite offer through their representative Governments—Queensland and New Zealand. Far earlier—in July—they had offered, in the one case 250, and in the other 200, mounted infantry. Directly it was decided that the wish of the colonies should be gratified—a wish for which we thank them—and that their splendid patriotism should not be subjected to what would have been a slight, we at once accepted both these proposals; and the same day we accepted the volunteering of the 108 New South Wales Lancers who were in this country. Therefore the first thing done on the 3rd of October was to accept 558 mounted men from these colonies. From the other colonies we had not received definite offers of specific bodies from the Governments, but we had received an expression of the wish that they might be allowed to take some part in this campaign. Public meetings were held and resolutions passed, but there was nothing definite. Naturally, time pressed at that moment. I went to Aldershot and asked Sir Redvers Buller whether he could give us some indication of the terms which should guide the colonies, so that each of them should be represented more or less in proportion to their population. Sir Redvers Buller said that it would be easier to give the colonies what they desired—that was, an immediate place at the front—if they were invited to contribute manageable units of 125 men each, for we did not wait for definite offers in some cases consisting of infantry, cavalry, and artillery. He felt that a sharp and short answer was the right way to meet the wishes of the colonies. That was our object, and it was achieved. That telegram was received with enthusiasm in every part of our colonial Empire. I want to narrow this thing down, because I should like the House to know the size of the matter about which so much has been made. Tasmania had offered infantry, but no cavalry, and that telegram was sent to South Australia, New South Wales, Victoria, and Canada, as a guiding line for them to follow. South Australia sent one infantry contingent of 125 men, and New South Wales, which had already contributed over 100, sent one contingent each of mounted and unmounted men, Victoria one of each, and Canada sent 1,000 infantry. So that the greatest possible number of mounted men accruing from that cable was 1,375, and if the Colonies had exercised the option given them, and had sent all mounted men, we should have had that number of mounted men in South Africa at an earlier date. That cable was sent when no one supposed for a moment that the force contemplated would prove insufficient for its purpose. This is not a defence, but it is an explanation, and as I am on the subject of mounted men, of which the right hon. Baronet made a great deal in his speech, and which, I believe, excites a great deal of attention, I may state that the first offer from the colonies was 1,616 unmounted and 841 mounted men. But these colonies have made further offers.

The colonial Legislatures have not changed their tone in consequence of the disappointments and disasters which have occurred to our arms. They were all ready to aid us with men in October last, before we had suffered any check or reverse, and were ready to go on doing so. In fact, they have set an example which might be followed nearer home. The second offer was 759 unmounted and 3,857 mounted men, so that in all we have accepted from our colonies 2,375 unmounted and 4,698 mounted men. I should now like to give the proportion of mounted and unmounted men at four important periods for the whole force in South Africa. In the original garrison in South Africa there were 7,600 unmounted and 2,000 mounted men—rather more than one in four were mounted. The totals on October 9, the day of the ultimatum, were 12,600 unmounted and 3,400 mounted—again rather more than one to four. The totals on January 1 were 83,600 unmounted and 19,800 mounted—a little less than one to four, but at that date we had just sent out a large infantry contingent; and the total complement that will shortly be there, not including the 8th Division or the 4th Cavalry Brigade, is 142,800 unmounted and 37,800 mounted men in South Africa, bringing the proportion again to something like one in four. The total of our troops in that country in the next fortnight or three weeks will be 180,600 men. I ought to suggest to the House that the Boers have the advantage of having no lines of communication, and if you deduct from the figures which I have given the troops necessary for our long lines of communications—which are necessarily infantry—the proportion of mounted to unmounted men in the field is a very much higher one than I have mentioned. I would also like to remind the House that I have counted all the artillery as being unmounted, so that I have not “cooked” the figures in order to present a fairer case. I do not know whether I ought to say a word about the Intelligence Department. I see that it excites some interest on the front bench opposite. For my part I see no reason for not giving a good deal of the information to the House which we have received from the Intelligence Department, and also giving the dates upon which it was received. The Intelligence Department printed for private and restricted circulation a book in 1898 on the numbers in the Transvaal, and another edition of that book was printed in June, 1899; and the figures which they gave were these:—In the Transvaal, liable for service, there were 29,279; add to that 800 for artillery and 1,500 for police; total 31,579. In the Orange Free State, between the ages of 16 and 60, there were 22,314. They deducted a little there, because 16 is a very young age for war, and put 20,000; or together, in round figures, 51,000. Then they estimated the number of men likely to join the enemy from the colonies at 4,000, making a total of 55,000, and they estimated the number of foreigners likely to come into the country, or who, being in the country, were likely to join them, at 4,000, making a total of 59,000 as the maximum force with which it was possible for these two Republics to take the field. We were informed in 1898 that the Transvaal Republic had sixteen Creusot 15c. guns. That fact was well known to us and to our officers in the field. One of the officers, when he heard that "Long Tom" had appeared on the scene, said, "One of our old friends has already made his appearance." We believed that they had in June last twenty-one 37-millimetre automatic guns, and we believed they had nine 75-millimetre guns—these all rank as field guns—and four howitzer 4.7in. guns. We believed that in September about eleven more 75-millimetre guns were introduced, that the Orange Free State had two batteries, or twelve 75-millimetre guns, making in all seventy-three guns. They had about eighteen old guns of various descriptions in 1891, and since then they have captured nineteen British guns, and their artillery stands now at 110 guns. It may be that since June last, and probably it is so, a certain number of guns, perhaps not a very great number, have been introduced into that country. As to maps, I think the Intelligence Department has served us well. Again, I would invite the House to consider the size of the task which they hold ought to have been efficiently grappled with. It ought to have been done when it could, but the possible theatre of war in South Africa is seven times the size of England and Wales. It is mountainous, waterless in parts, and many tracts are uninhabited, and the cost and labour of making an accurate ordnance survey, so to speak, of so vast a tract of the earth's surface render it not a feasible project. We should have needed a staff of officers travelling with large camps and supplies of necessaries over the Transvaal, which was not an operation that would have been tolerated by them, and could not have been undertaken by any staff, however numerous. But we had the Cape Survey, we had the colonial map of Natal, and in 1896 two officers were sent out to Natal to make a map one inch to the mile of the northern triangle of Natal. Our information was to the effect that the garrison of Natal, augmented to the degree contemplated and the degree absolutely adopted when the time came, would be able to hold an invasion back at some point further north than Ladysmith, and therefore, unfortunately, this map is of the country north of Ladysmith and omits the little part which has been of such absorbing interest for the last six months between Ladysmith and the Tugela. Another officer was sent out to make sketches and maps of all bridges and approaches, and these were printed a year and a half ago; also maps of possible lines of communication, and officers were sent out to make maps of all places of military interest. These maps had been liberally distributed to the troops to the number of 14,150 maps and 170,005 sheets. There is one other matter upon which there have been misconceptions which I should like to remove. It is the question of local forces in South Africa. I must ask hon. Members to carry two things in their minds which I think are fair provisos on which I may stipulate. The first is that the Ministers of Natal deprecated, and that the Ministers of Cape Colony absolutely declined to authorise, the raising of any Volunteers before the outbreak of war. In the case of self-governing colonies nothing would have been more imprudent, disastrous, or inconceivable than that the Government of this country should have exercised any pressure upon them. On 7th September Sir Alfred Milner recommended that the Imperial Light Horse should be raised. Authority for raising it was given the next day. On 28th September Sir Alfred Milner advised that the general officer commanding there—not the Ministers—should be authorised to raise Imperially 2,000 infantry for local defence, and in his despatches he has informed us that it was necessary until the large field force came out. They were not at that time regarded, any more than the contingents from other colonies, as necessary helps to our arms. Similarly, a request was made for 1,000 infantry in Natal, and that was granted; but the question of mounted men did not arise until October 17th, when Sir George White asked that he might raise 1,000 mounted men. I will not deny that some delay ensued, and I will frankly tell the House what was the cause. In addition to the constitutional difficulties there was this difficulty—that the troops we had accepted from Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and the other colonies, were being paid at the Imperial rate of 1s. 3d. a day, and those troops which were suggested in South Africa were asking for 5s. a day. Now, that was a matter in which the Colonial Office naturally had to be consulted. It was not a matter which could be decided off-hand. The Treasury had to be consulted, but the total delay involved was one week, because Sir George White telegraphed on October 25th that he had begun to raise the 1,000 men. I do not think that a question of that kind, raising many curious precedents, should have been rushed through. This is the first time in which our colonies have come forward and helped us, and even if we had waited a week or two for men, who are now sorely needed, we were justified in not doing hastily, and perhaps in a bungling fashion, a piece of work which would be remembered long after these dark shadows have passed away and our reverses are forgotten. Subsequently to that Sir Redvers Buller informed us that he was raising as many mounted men as he could, and we have more than once telegraphed to South Africa enquiring whether we could assist in the rapidity of raising such a force by sending out more saddlery or other necessities that may be wanted. I do not think, therefore, that the case against the Government as to local troops is a very strong one. I have tried, as I promised, to give a full and true account of the steps—

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has given us the total number of the local South African force.

MR. WYNDHAM: I should say it is increasing every day. It was 26,000 a fortnight ago.

Mr. Wyndham.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: In addition to the 180,000?

MR. WYNDHAM: No; 180,000 was the total figure. An hon. Member has reminded me to say something about the sighting of the Lee-Enfield rifle. Hon. Members who take an interest in such matters know that the bullet of every rifle has a drift to the right or left in accordance with the rifling of the barrel. That being the case, no rifle is even theoretically accurate except at one range. You have to correct the sighting of every rifle to do away with this drift along a curve. The Lee-Enfield rifle is theoretically correct at 500 yards; but it has been discovered that the correction made in order to do away with the effect of the drift was overdone, that the sight was shifted a very little way—three-hundredths of an inch—too much in order to correct this error in theoretical accuracy at 500 yards. The result is that the rifle does throw a little to the right, and at any shorter range than 500 yards that divergence is increased. But a theoretical error of that kind is absolutely swallowed up, if I may say so, in the idiosyncrasy of every rifle, of every man, and the atmosphere of any day. So true is that that nobody discovered this error until the other day, though many of the best targets were made with that rifle so sighted at Bisley. The fact being known, two courses were open to us—to say nothing about it, or openly to aim at theoretical accuracy. As the operation of shifting the sight could be performed by any armourer in the course of a few hours, we have recalled the Lee-Enfield rifle from the Yeomanry, refitted it, and given it back; and we have sent out the necessary back sights to make the correction in South Africa. I have endeavoured to give a full and fair account of the steps we have taken. I have done that not so much in order to exonerate the War Office as to place, as far as I could, this House in a better position to judge the further steps which we must make. Nothing stands between us and those further steps but this Amendment. The sooner it is disposed of the sooner we shall get to practical proposals. At the opening of my speech I spoke somewhat bitterly of this Amendment: and I now confess that it had been in my mind to conclude perhaps in a bitter spirit. Sir,

I do regret this Amendment. I regret it for the delay which it has brought into our proceedings. I regret it, although we may understand it here. I do not wish to press the matter too hotly; an amendment must be cleverly drawn to bring into one lobby a number of hon. Members who hold views diametrically opposed to each other on a question of life-and-death importance to many. We who are initiated in these manœuvres, which, though, perhaps, in ordinary times pardonable, are at this moment inopportune, may understand them. But no one else will. The taxpayer who is prepared to foot this Bill, whatever it may be, and who is perhaps even now thinking of taking his children back from school and of foregoing his autumn holiday, he will not understand it. Our critics abroad, who are not too indulgent, they will not understand it. Our fellow-subjects in Natal, who have perhaps seen their sons die on the battlefield, and their homesteads destroyed, they will not understand this Amendment and this debate. Our kinsmen in America, who are watching the vicissitudes of this war, they will not understand it. The Legislatures of every single colony in our Empire, which have shown such a whole-hearted and single-minded concentration upon the Imperial aspects, and upon none other, of our present difficulties will not understand it. Let us, let this honoured and ancient assembly, of which they are all offshoots and children, bear that in mind. It is usual, Sir, to conclude such a speech in defence, or, as I would prefer to say, in explanation of the conduct of the Government with an appeal to the House to reject the vote of censure which is proposed; but I am sure that in this case such an appeal is unnecessary. I shall have to make an appeal upon questions of practical importance and living moment. I shall have to ask this House for large financial facilities in order that this war may be prosecuted to the only conclusion which the country would tolerate. I shall have to ask the House for still further financial facilities in order that our system of military defence may be placed upon a sound and lasting basis. I do not ask the House to reject this vote of censure. No, Sir; this House, which is the fountain of our Imperial resources, and which is the ultimate guardian of the nation's honour, will not commit itself to an action which, if perpetrated, would make the mother of Parliaments a laughing-stock to the world.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, West): Everyone must have been fascinated as much by the manner as by the matter of the speech of my hon. friend, the Under Secretary for War; but I wish that he had been more consistently encouraging, and had omitted that one note of pessimism with which his speech commenced, and which I must say I regret. The First Lord of the Treasury has, I think, also, perhaps, taken too unencouraging a tone in addressing us at this dark time. I cannot myself accept the view that there is any essential reason why these troubles should have overtaken us. I cannot accept the view that there is anything in our Constitution, or in the nature of our people, which makes it inevitable that we should have to submit to these humiliations, now or at any other time. I do not admit the relevancy of those references to the Sikh War and the events of many years ago. The times have changed, and we are now face to face with a state of scientific preparation such as the world has never seen, and unless we adapt our methods to the changed circumstances, we shall have to pay a penalty of humiliation and disaster which is terrible to contemplate. I wish the First Lord could have taken a more cheerful tone in the addresses he has given to the country, and abandoned the suggestion that we should accept as necessary and inevitable the circumstances which we deplore. I entirely agree with my hon. friend the Under Secretary for War, that up to the present period of the debate we might just as well have discussed the reason why Julius Cæsar invaded Britain, as this vote of censure. I do not believe the country cares one single jot for the matters discussed yesterday and to-day. The country does not care about how these difficulties have come upon us, but how they are to be dealt with. We are in a dangerous and difficult position, which any day may become a very serious position. What we want to know is, how we are going to emerge with honour and success from it. I do not agree that it was necessary or desirable to discuss the question which my right hon. friend, the Member for the Forest of Dean, illuminated with his usual perspicuity. I do not see that anything is to be gained for the public welfare by discussing War Office responsibility, or by asking us to enter into a discussion of questions of that kind at the present moment. I prefer to devote myself to another phase of this subject. We are face to face with realities; what the country is troubling itself about is what we are going to do now. The First Lord of the Treasury told us some time ago that he had come to the general conclusion that no one was actually responsible for the present state of affairs.

Third Day.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I did not say that.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I am sorry if I have misrepresented the right hon. Gentleman, but it was said by some person, a member of the Government, and I thought it was the right hon. Gentleman. I myself feel very strongly that it is absolutely true—and the greater the truth the greater the libel—that at the present moment no one is really responsible for what has happened. The complaint is that we have so organised our system that we are now face to face with a condition of things for which no one is really responsible. There is an academic phrase that every Member is responsible for what is done by the Cabinet as a whole. But we cannot now lay our finger upon the person or persons to whom we ought to go for an explanation. Whoever is responsible, we have now to contemplate the fact that the system has worked itself in such a way that at this moment we are without any organised army at all within the limits of the United Kingdom. I do not know whether the House realises to what extent that is true. I think there is no harm, and there may be some public advantage, in repeating what the exact facts are. The Under Secretary for War said that at the present moment the barracks of the country were full to overflowing. I think I shall be able to show that that is a misleading statement. It is, of course, true in fact, or it would not have been made; but it is misleading, and the impression the hon. Gentleman made was misleading. It is not fair to state to the country that we are so well provided with troops, that the barracks are at this moment full to overflowing. As soon as the troops under orders to go

have departed we shall have only left six battalions of Infantry of the Line and three battalions of Guards, all under strength, and as far as the Line battalions are concerned, largely composed of men who are not fit to take part in active operations. We shall have nine cavalry regiments, some without horses, and all under strength. Beyond these we shall have nothing at all, nothing. I shall be told, of course, that we have the Volunteers and the Militia, and that already the Militia have been embodied, and that we can make use of the embodied Militia infantry and artillery. But that is a delusion, and I challenge the opinion of anyone acquainted with modern armies to contend for a moment that this mob of untrained or semi-trained men bears any resemblance whatever to an army. These troops are without training, without guns, without cavalry, without equipment, and without proper reserves of ammunition and stores. We are told that the Militia may be regarded as an effective contribution to the defensive force, but I would remind the House that these Militia battalions are being treated in a way most detrimental to their efficiency. A very considerable number, probably the most efficient, have already been sent out of the country, and with regard to the others let me give an example of what is happening. One Militia battalion now doing duty in the United Kingdom arrived at its destination 540 strong, but immediately on their arrival at the garrison 120 of the best men were drafted away to do duty as Militia Reserve with the Line battalion. Now that Militia battalion has added to it two companies of the Line regiment who were unfit for active service, and so great is the lack of officers that not a single officer of the Line battalion could be spared to take charge of these two companies, and they are left to the temporary superintendence of an officer who happens to be home on leave from India, and to the officers of the unembodied Militia battalions. I intend to avoid the glittering lure which has been trailed before me by the Under Secretary for War. I am not likely to abandon opinions formed after long study, but I shall certainly not give way to any criticism not absolutely necessary in illustration of what I want to bring before the House. My hon. friend says that we cannot have an army in South Africa and an army in the United Kingdom at the same time. That sounds like a platitude or a truism ; but I say that until we can have an army both in South Africa and in the United Kingdom we can have no absolute guarantee for the safety of this country, except in the supremacy of our Navy. I believe that when the people of this country realise, as they must in the days immediately to come realise, that they have given up the whole of their defence, and jeopardised it across the sea, they will ask for very effective action to put themselves in a position of defence. I have been contending for years past that the system we have adopted has this fatal fault : that the very moment it comes into operation, and is called upon to do the thing for which it was created, it must instantly and necessarily fail. I have said, and I have never wearied of saying, that the first result of mobilisation would be that our whole available resources would be taken up in the first line. Well, the whole of our first line is in the field, and we have nothing behind it. We had a few months ago, before the war began, 183,000 of the Regular Army in this country, 106,000 on the active list, and 77,000 in the First Class Army Reserve. We have sent out between 70,000 and 80,000 to South Africa, and in order to produce that contingent we have all but swallowed up the First Class Reserve ; we have drawn on the Militia Reserve, and now we are without a single available organised unit in the United Kingdom. To show how difficult it is to make people understand the true meaning of our position—and that is not made more easy by the speeches made even by the best-intentioned members of our Government—I noticed the other day that the First Lord of the Admiralty, who I believe to be one of the best administrators of our Navy, the most fighting member of the Cabinet, and of whom I speak with profound respect, has so far misunderstood our position in this matter that he gave an explanation of our system greatly calculated to mislead. He asked a question how far those who criticised the Army system were justified ; that is, those who criticised the young soldiers, and he exclaimed : "Where are these young soldiers now ? See how magnificently they are fighting the battles of this country on the hills of Natal." Well, the only thing to be said is, that not one of these young soldiers has been within 7,000 miles of South Africa. It would have been inconsistent with the system that they should have gone. It was because 30,000 young soldiers had been left behind that we have had to call out the First Class Reserve, to embody the Militia, and to call out the Militia Reserve, and to resort to what I have before now called the illicit process of taking from the Volunteers, who ought to be retained for home defence, to fill up the gaps in the mounted infantry at the front. We have got the whole organised army out of the country, and now the War Office is face to face with the problem of how to make an army to take its place. My hon. friend the Under Secretary for War did not say anything about the question of the absence of field guns. He spoke, although I did not quite follow him, as to the number of guns that have gone to South Africa ; but he did not dwell on the fact that by despatching these guns we had absolutely denuded this country of guns. We are now face to face with a situation which has been foreseen with absolute certainty any time during the last ten years. I want the House to realise that this is merely emergency action which is being taken now. I do not know whether the House realises that we have at the present moment in this country 56,000 artillery, all more or less accustomed to handling projectiles, who know what the sound of guns is like, and who are receiving capitation grant or pay as artillerymen. But from that enormous force we have not been able to constitute one single effective field battery. The Government should immediately commence to organise the Volunteer and Militia artillery as effective field artillery. It does not require any text book to prove that a mob of men unprovided with artillery are negligible participants in modern war. We are told that we are to have an announcement before long as to the intentions of the Government in regard to reorganisation at home. I only hope that the reorganisation will be very thorough indeed. I would make this observation in regard to it, that the country ought not to be too ready to accept the proposals which are made without some scrutiny, because these proposed changes will be merely a performance, under stress, and in the face of a great national danger, of a duty which, in the opinion of many persons, ought to have been performed long ago, but which we were told was unnecessary and superfluous. We were told that these preparations were superfluous, and never would be required, and when we review the situation now, we have a right to scrutinise with some care the proposals made, and see that they are not only sufficient, but that they correspond to some real vital principle of the nation's needs, something necessary not only for the present but for the time to come. Now, I hope my hon. friend will admit that I have not spoken an unfair word on the subjects which are very near to my heart, in regard to the Department over which he presides. I trust he will also accept my statement when I say I do not abate one jot of my views as to the methods by which that Department has thought fit to conduct the operations of this war, and has thought fit to organise the resources of this country for this or any other war. I know he will not think the worse of me if I reserve to myself the privilege at a later date of trying to establish, as I believe I can—having studied stage by stage the facts of this war—that the shortcomings of the War Office in the direction of this war have been grave, and are apparent. I should not like to sit down in this debate, or in any debate at such a time, without adding my word of protest in regard to the fact that we are discussing this Amendment at all. I am utterly unable to understand by any train of argument which commends itself to my mind as an intelligent Englishman, how hon. Members on the other side of the House can reconcile it with their idea of duty to take the course which has been adopted. I entirely concur with the hon. Member when he said that though we who know the tricks of the House of Commons may find temporary amusement and some solace in the idea that this Amendment is in conformity with precedent, and with very evil precedent; the choosing of this opportunity to force a Vote will be universally misunderstood outside the limits of this House. I can see no contra to the evil which must attend the prosecution of this Amendment to its legitimate conclusion. I can see nothing but disappointment of the hopes of our people outside our own islands and the just expectations of our people at home. The people of this country are making tremendous sacrifices, and, what is perhaps greater than all others, showing a forbearance, a reserve, and a resolution in the face of difficulties which is hard to display, but which is beyond all praise when it is displayed. The chief feature of the attack made within the last two days has been the repetition of the contemptible personalities which, masquerading under the guise of a matter of principle, end in accusations against one member of the Government, the Colonial Secretary. I may, in my time, have had the rough side of the Colonial Secretary's tongue, and I certainly have no right to champion him; but I do feel this—it is a matter of common knowledge—that if you go all over the British world you will find but one view, that there is a man in that great office who has at last succeeded in winning the confidence and securing the esteem of our only friends, the people of our great Colonies. And yet that is the one man who has been picked out as the object of these perpetual scurrilities and exhibitions of petty personal spite. It is a matter of report that during this debate a right hon. Member of the Party opposite proposes to make an attack in form upon the Colonial Secretary. I do not know whether that report is true or not, but I want to ask the House, and through the House the country, to look at the picture presented. On the one hand, we have throughout the length and breadth of the land wives giving their husbands, mothers giving their children, brothers giving their brothers, and fathers giving their sons, men and women giving up everything they care about, everything they love, everything they cherish most, for the service of their country. They are perfectly prepared that these relatives of theirs should die, if need be, rather than we should fail; and this feeling, admirable as it is, is explained not merely by the fact that we have met with checks and reverses in South Africa—that is a thing of the time only—but because our people have the sense to see that behind these temporary difficulties there are the great Powers of Europe, our jealous enemies, ready to take advantage of any failure, of any slip, indeed of anything which may precipitate that fall which they desire to see, and which they are so anxious and willing to hasten. It is at the time when we are laying on the altar everything that is most precious to us, that this high priest shuffles out of his retreat swinging his miserable dead cat, and depositing on the national altar the offering of his little bit of carrion. I am speaking of the Member for West Monmouth, who we are told is about to seize this situation to renew the series of miserable attacks upon a particular member of the Government. Well, if I am addressing a few, I speak for many when I express the weariness and disgust felt by millions of people in this country for these reiterated attacks and trivialities which nobody cares about. I hope the House will be addressed, before the debate ends, by the First Lord himself, and by those who are responsible for administering the great power of this country, and addressed in words which will blow away that feeling of discontent which undoubtedly exists, and that feeling of despondency which, perhaps, to some extent he and other members of his Government have had some small part in creating, and will substitute for it a feeling of vigorous hopefulness which they will be only too ready to assume when the time comes.

MR. PHILIPPS (Pembroke): In one respect the House has been treated by the hon. Member who has just sat down to a defence of an alleged envenomed attack upon the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary, which has not yet been delivered. The hon. Member said you are going to hear, either to-night or to-morrow, a most envenomed attack made from the other side of the House. No one knew what he was alluding to, and it was only just previous to his sitting down that he alluded to the attack on the right hon. Member for West Birmingham by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Monmouth. It must indeed be a dreadful attack if he has to defend it in advance, but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Monmouth can take care of himself and does not want to be defended by me or anybody else. It seems to me the most interesting part of the Amendment is that relating to the war rather than that which preceded it. With regard to that part of the Amendment the Leader of the House has said that the unanimity of the people is worth more to this country than an army corps. That is true, but there are many in the country who think, I hope wrongly, that something is being concealed by the Colonial Office. It was alluded to by the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries the other night, and if the Government can, by putting the telegrams on the Table of the House, reassure the people that we have nothing to conceal, they will do more to make the country unanimous than in any other way, and so end this topic once and for all. It rests with the Government to end this discussion, and not this side of the House. With regard to the war, I do not want to criticise the generals. Only one bitter personal attack has been made on one of our generals, and that was a most scandalous one. We all know the difficulty of getting supplies to the front, and that the men who are fighting have only the bare necessities of life. We know that the transport must be under a great strain, and yet there are many people of social and political influence who seem to have gone out to South Africa to be mere spectators of the war. I hope the Government once and for all will say they do not want any persons sent to the front save their own soldiers and press correspondents. There are many who have gone to the front to look at the war as a mere spectacle. Something of the same kind occurred at the beginning of the fight at Ladysmith, and I hope the Government will put a stop to it. Now the Government say this Amendment is unreasonable, as it embodies two conflicting propositions, but in my opinion that is not so. We are not bound to go into the question of the justification of the war; what we press on the Government is, it was their duty to preserve peace or prepare for war. We think the Government have not made sufficient preparation, and it is because that is my opinion that I shall support this Amendment. It has been a matter of frequent comment that our preparations for the dispatch of troops to South Africa were not commenced as soon as they might have been. When the war broke out the Government assured us that no useful purpose would be served by dispatching troops earlier, because had we done so the Boers would have moved earlier. But it is now admitted that the Boers could not move before the grass had grown, and had we despatched troops earlier we should have had a great military advantage. Then it was said that the Government did not want to go to war until there was unanimity of opinion. That is all very well, but the people of this country look for a lead, and they do not want a Government to look for the opinion of "the man in the street." It is then said that the Government did not like to use warlike threats during peace negotiations. That is a good reason for not sending an army out sooner, but then the Government might have made preparations of a different kind. They might have got ships ready; our first contingents were sent out in slow ships because we had not got the fast ones, which we might have had, and when the Government did secure the ships they were not fitted for the carriage of horses. All these matters might have been arranged before without anybody being the wiser. But I am afraid that in all these matters the Government is influenced by the Treasury, and is afraid to spend public money; it is a case of economy which has proved to be false economy indeed. There is also a feeling in the country that our generals have been interfered with by political advice. In a recent speech we were told that was not so, that the generals were given a free hand to do as they liked. We know, however, from the despatch of Sir George White that that was not so. He was not, it is true, interfered with by the Government at home, but he was interfered with by Sir Walter Hely Hutchinson, the Civil Governor of Natal, who is a servant of the Colonial Office. The First Lord of the Treasury told us that the plan of campaign was to mass a large body of troops in Cape Colony and invade the Orange Free State; but a great mass of those troops were withdrawn from Cape Colony to Natal through the advice of the Civil Governor of Natal. I therefore ask whether there has not indeed been interference with the generals at the seat of war. Part of the army was drafted off to Natal for the relief of Ladysmith, and a considerable number were sent to the relief of Kimberley. Was that done by direct interference of the Colonial Office? We know the position of Kimberley. Mr. Cecil Rhodes is there. I am not going to say a word against him, because he is a man who has redeemed his faults by his bravery, not only in the Matabele War but at Kimberley. No doubt the relief of Kimberley is desirable, but it is not the ultimate aim of our operations. We know Mr. Rhodes has great influence at the Colonial Office, and we know from that unfortunate correspondence that there is something which Mr. Rhodes knew which the Colonial Office did not desire to be disclosed. Has pressure been put by Mr. Rhodes on Sir Alfred Milner? I should like to know what passed between Mr. Rhodes and the Colonial Office before Kimberley was invested. We have been told that our system is a failure, and we have been told that at some time, when the war is over, the Government is to review and revise our system, and give us a perfect one. That does not seem to be practical. This Government has been in office nearly five years, and the Conservative party nearly eleven years, and whatever the system is this Government is responsible for it. The Under Secretary for War made a brilliant and eloquent defence, and a very good defence of his system, as good a defence as could have been made, but it did not cover the whole of the points. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean called attention to the fact that the First Lord of the Treasury had said a short time ago that the Government had sent to South Africa artillery for three army corps. It is now admitted that, even with the batteries sent out since, they are nothing like what they ought to be. They are newly-formed batteries, with untrained horses. Everybody knows it is hard enough to train a horse for harness work, but much more so to train him for the battlefield. Horses which are untrained can in no way be so useful as an old-established battery ought to be. It is the Tory party which is responsible for the reduction in the number of artillery batteries, and that party must bear the responsibility. I think everybody admits that if ever there was a time when it was necessary for the Volunteers to practise shooting it is at present, and this is the very time at which their reserve of ammunition is withdrawn. In the training of the Yeomanry it is admitted that it has been difficult to get even a sufficient supply of ammunition to enable them to practise shooting. The Under Secretary of State for War has made a most optimistic defence of the position of the Government, and anybody listening to him would almost believe that all our operations had been crowned with brilliant success, and that if they had not been successful it was owing in no way to the fault of the Government. But the hon. Member's noble Leader is not such an optimist. Lord Salisbury did not take that view, for he said our misfortunes were due to three causes. One of them was the British Constitution, which we have always with us. In my opinion it would be just as practical to blame the weather. Another cause was promotion by seniority. That may be a bad thing, but why did the Government not alter it years ago? Lastly, the noble Marquess attached the blame to the absence of secret service money, and said we did not have the advantage of secret service money which the leading Powers of Europe possessed, and which was even possessed by the Boers. He also said that he did not wish in any way to blame the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he used these words—

“The Chancellor of the Exchequer has acted with great judgment and consideration, but I say this—that our Treasury has gradually acquired the power of governing every part of the administration, and by means of the exercise of the power of the purse claims a voice in all the decisions of all the administrative authority.”

This is what Lord Salisbury said about the smallness of the secret service money. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not tell the same tale, for he said—

“After what has been said in various places, and in view of the interpretation that might be placed upon that statement, it is necessary for me to say that, from the very beginning of this matter, neither the Treasury nor the Chancellor of the Exchequer has, in any way, stinted either the preparations or expenditure which was thought necessary by the Cabinet with regard to this war.”

Lord Salisbury says the Treasury did stint the secret service money, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer says he did not. I take it that he could not. If a member of the Cabinet refused any demand made by the Cabinet, he would have to resign. Therefore, it goes without saying that he cannot have refused the demand of the Cabinet. Probably the real explanation of the situation is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer all the while was using his influence to prevent the expenditure of secret service money, and succeeded in over-persuading his colleagues. There must be some foundation for these contradictory statements. Lord Salisbury took no optimistic view of this matter upon other points, but I do not wish to go into them now. I only want to say that as regards secret service money this House has never refused the Government anything, and if the Government came now and stated that they wanted more secret service money the House would vote them any sum they might require.

MR. VICARY GIBBS (Herts, St. Albans): Of course they would now.

MR. PHILIPPS: It would be most useful to do it now, for our generals are hampered by having long lines of communication to keep open and railways to defend in countries where the people are not favourable to us, and that is where a great part of our army is locked up. Would it not be possible by freely expending secret service money to put the Boers in the same position? The Government have stated what they believe the forces of the Boers to be, and what they estimate the Boer forces must be which are locked up in defending the frontiers of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State. I am going to make this suggestion—would it not be possible by offering rewards in Cape Town to get men who would take the risk?—even one individual might strike a blow at the Boer communications by making an attack upon the enemy's lines. The Transvaal must be full of men who are not Boers and who like money, and in Natal there must be thousands of men who know the Transvaal and the Orange Free State quite as well as the Boers. Is it not possible that if the Government offered £50,000 they might find someone to destroy a bridge behind the Boer armies? Even to have a culvert on a railway destroyed for two days might be of vital assistance to our generals at the front. I wish the Government would ask for more secret service money, for I am sure the House of Commons would gladly vote it. [AN HON. MEMBER: I am not so sure about it.] The hon. Member says he is not so sure about it, but if the majority of this House refused it, the responsibility would be with them. I think it is time something was done to deal with this question, for Lord Salisbury, speaking in the House of Lords—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member must not refer to a speech made in the House of Lords.

Third Day.

MR. PHILIPPS : I will only say that other members of the Government have not all taken the same optimistic view of our foreign relations as has been taken by the right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Government benches in this House. And last of all I will say that, for myself, I am not going to vote on this Amendment in any party spirit. When this House met last autumn I made up my mind that, as far as I could, while this war lasted I would either vote with the Government or abstain from voting altogether. That is what I intended to do this session, but I have now changed my mind, and I am going to vote against the Government on this Amendment, and whenever I have a chance. I am not doing this in any party spirit, because it is perfectly obvious from the position of this House that no Liberal Government could be formed to take office with any consensus of opinion in this House behind it. Any Government formed now would have to be formed simply to carry on the war. If the Government were beaten on this Amendment what would happen? There are three possible alternatives. There might be a Liberal Government; there might be a coalition Government; or there might be another Conservative Government. I believe that either on this or the other side of the House you could form a much stronger Government than the one we have in power to-day, and it is because I believe that you cannot do a better service to our soldiers at the front than to give them a strong Cabinet at home, that I am going to vote against a Government which has been guilty of weakness and vacillation such as has rarely been seen before. That is why I am going to vote for this Amendment—because I believe it is the best and the most patriotic course to adopt.

*MR. VICARY GIBBS : I think the country has been looking forward with the greatest anxiety to the meeting of Parliament, not so much because they wanted to hear what we had to say, but because they were very much afraid that our indiscretions might be injurious to the public service and the welfare of the country. I cannot help thinking, after listening to the speech of the hon. Member who has just sat down, that in some respects those fears are well founded. I am sure the hon. Gentleman is inspired by patriotic motives, but he takes a very strange road to carry out those convictions. Let us consider for a moment what advantage could possibly accrue to this country from raising at this juncture all those unpleasant discussions about the Hawksley letters and telegrams. Does he suppose that would do any good? Does he suppose that the making of a grave and most injurious insinuation, founded on what really seems to me no basis at all, will do any good? I refer to his suggestion that the military operations on the western frontier of the Orange Free State and in the north of Cape Colony have been arranged to suit the personal safety of Mr. Rhodes.

MR. PHILIPPS : I did not say it was to suit Mr. Rhodes's personal safety, for he is one of the bravest men alive.

*MR. VICARY GIBBS : That certainly appeared to be the meaning, if there was any meaning at all, contained in the insinuation of the hon. Member. He said he wished to have an answer to that question, but the only member of the Government who honours him or me by his presence does not seem to take any notice of it. The hon. Member wanted to know what telegrams had passed between Kimberley and the Colonial Office concerning the military operations for the relief of Kimberley, and he hinted that the importance of relieving Kimberley was increased because Mr. Rhodes happened to be there.

MR. PHILIPPS : I did not say that.

*MR. VICARY GIBBS : I will not dwell upon that point further, although I do not think the statement of the hon. Member was a wise one. I will leave that question altogether and turn to what really does concern the country. I think the country and the House as a whole is disgusted with this continuous pot and kettle business which is going on between the two front benches. That is not what the country wants to hear, and the people are rather inclined to say, "A plague o' both your houses." It is no satisfaction to hear that we had a worse Government in 1881 if we have a bad Government now. For any Member sitting on this side of the House to vote in favour of this Amendment it would be necessary to believe not only that the Government had committed certain errors and blunders, but he would have to go much further, for he would have to believe that there were men sitting on the benches opposite more capable of carrying on the Government of the country and pulling the cart out of the rut, and helping England when England needs help sorely. He would have to believe that such men existed, that they were united, if not on general principles at least as to the conduct of this war, as to its propriety, its necessity, and as to its continuance. But what are the facts? Why, we have the character of Mr. Facing Both Ways in "The Pilgrim's Progress." We have the Leader of the Opposition, and I pity him, and he is a subject for pity, for he has had to try and shepherd into the same fold the hon. Member for Northampton and the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton; and a more difficult and impossible task could not exist. This clever Amendment has been so prepared and designed that it is considered capable of drawing into the same net men who have precisely the same feelings about this war as we have, only they sit on the other side of the House. They are men who differ absolutely as to the justice and propriety of the war. We saw the noble Lord who moved this Amendment get up and support it, because he considered the war was unjust and unnecessary. A few minutes after we heard the hon. and learned Member for South Shields, and he supported the same Amendment because the war was just and inevitable. Are those the people that we are to hand over the government of this country to? I daresay hon. Members on the other side say it is quite sufficient because I sit on this side of the House that I should support the Government. We have heard a great many people giving an account of their own patriotism—and very interesting accounts they are. I will give an account of mine. I came down to this House with no great tenderness for individuals, and with no great tenderness for my party or the members of the Government, and what will astonish hon. Members much more, I came down with a great indifference to my own political career. And yet I was perfectly prepared to vote and speak with one simple object—that of benefitting my country. How can I benefit the country best? By simply showing the mischief which this debate does. What do we see in the French papers to-day? They say that, as enemies of England, they rejoice at this debate, and one cynical Frenchman says: "It is just what we should do ourselves." I understand and recognise the propriety of Members such as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose or the right hon. Member for Bodmin, who look upon this war as rotten in its inception, foolish in its execution, and equally discreditable and dangerous to the country. They would fight tooth and nail to stop this war and to turn out the Government who are responsible for it. I recognise their position, although I do not agree with them, and I can sympathise with the Leader of the Opposition, who has to try and ride two horses at once. I cannot, however, understand the patriotism of such men as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, who have upheld the justice of the war in the country, and yet support this Amendment here. What do they hope to get by success or failure? Do they hope to turn the Government out? They have said outside that that is the last thing they desire to do, and they are very wise. If they fail, what else are they doing but simply washing dirty linen in public and helping to embarrass and hinder the Government? We think it would be somewhat difficult to find the same amount of credit, ability, and reputation as that which is possessed by the gentlemen who are good enough to lead us at this moment. Leaving for a moment that part of the subject I should like to say, if the House will bear with me, a few words about the speech made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean. Is it not somewhat unworthy of Parliamentary practice to take up some little florid rhetorical utterance made under exceptional circumstances, and to read into it a solemn statement of Government knowledge or Government policy? And yet that is what we have heard done in this House. The First Lord of the Treasury spoke of there being no more chance of the Orange Free State joining in a war against us than there was of Switzerland. To treat such a phrase as proof that the Government was totally ignorant of the actual condition in South Africa is absurd; but the First Lord of the Treasury says he does not think about his speeches. I only wish that his modesty did not lead him to underrate the importance of every word he utters so long as he occupies the administrative position which he does. When he sees his words distorted and misrepresented in the way we have seen them, he must feel how vitally important it is that he should choose his words in such a way as it is not necessary for humbler persons to do. Of course the question of Cabinet responsibility is very rightly urged by the right hon. Baronet opposite, but is it not carrying it to the point of becoming ludicrous to blame them because this or that bridge has not been destroyed in the north of Natal? The Cabinet are responsible for the generals who have been appointed, but to discredit them to the country because a culvert was not blown up is ridiculous and unreasonable. Let me take another point. Although the right hon. Baronet expressed his determination not to criticise the generals in the field, he went to a considerable length in that direction, and he went on to say that it was monstrous folly to occupy a position like Ladysmith, which had hills all round it, which he called an absolutely indefensible hole. On these matters the right hon. Baronet is a very clever man, but I would remind him that Ladysmith is still being defended and has proved to be defensible, though it may not have been the best position from a military point of view. He has also blamed the Government for putting vast amounts of stores there. All I have to say is, thank God they did. As far as I can see the only danger of Ladysmith falling is that their ammunition or rations will not hold out. When General White had a check he was severely criticised, but since then I think he has satisfied us all that he is an extremely able man, and we congratulate him upon the skill with which he has held that position. If it was true that Ladysmith was indefensible we should certainly have had another Yorktown there before this. I should like to say a word or two about the speech of the Under Secretary for War. I call it a fine speech, and I consider that it elevated the debate. I consider that when his speech is read in the country it will do something to restore confidence to "the man in the street," about whom we have heard so much. What has "the man in the street" been doing? While one has been giving his money another has torn himself away from those who are so dear to him and gone to the front. While this has been going on certain politicians have been considering whether they could score off their political opponents on account of this war. Over and over again I have seen this in places where I never expected to see it, and where I blushed to see it. There is an old Greek proverb which sets forth that even a fool can give you useful advice, and perhaps some much more distinguished men than myself may listen to me in this matter. I am sure it will do more credit to this House, and to themselves, and their country, if those Members will unite at such a juncture as this and consider how we can improve our position in the future, and set right our false system, instead of going about saying that the Tory party is to be blamed for this and the Radical party for something else. I think we might drop all this until we are out of danger. Common-sense and reason dictates that we should do this, however quarrelsome we may be, whenever we find ourselves in absolute danger of disgrace and humiliation to our Empire; because everyone must know that there is a great responsibility in letting loose the dogs of war, for God alone knows where they will stop, and if England once gets on her back you will always find there is someone ready to jump on her. We know perfectly well that England has not got too many friends abroad, and her power and position has led to intense jealousy. In the face of all these considerations let us show a united front. I was very grateful to my hon. friend, the Under Secretary for War, for doing something to raise the tone of the debate. There was one point, however, in which he started a perfectly new defence of the Government, and he almost seemed to raise the point so high as to say that there was a sort of moral duty upon this country to be unprepared for the quarrels in which she engages. A more startling moral proposition I never heard enunciated. He quoted in support of this a speech of Lord Hardinge, and he said that if we had taken the necessary steps we should have justified our enemies and placed ourselves in the wrong. How about our faithful colonies, and those friends of ours in Natal whom everybody prizes? Was it our moral duty to leave them in a condition of unpreparedness to resist invasion? The hon. Member opposite referred to the secret service, and said that even now more money might be profitably employed in the secret service of the Government. If it is required, for goodness' sake let them come and ask for it, and I am perfectly certain they will get it with very little opposition. They may be desirous of coming to us with such a proposition, but so long as this debate is continued no practical advantage can come to this country, and no practical proposals can be considered for remedying the defects in our system. When I think of the patience which the House has already shown me, I have come to the conclusion that the sooner I bring my own share in the debate to an end the better.

*MR. MENDL (Plymouth): The hon. Member who has just sat down has dwelt during a great portion of his remarks upon the necessity of bringing this debate to a conclusion on the grounds of patriotism. In that he has followed one or two of his own leaders—the Under Secretary for War to-night and the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs last night—who appear to think that any discussion or criticism of the conduct or of the preparations for the war or the South African policy of the Government is something of the nature of the crime of high treason on the part of the Opposition. I venture to protest against that doctrine with all my heart. It seems to me a most dangerous doctrine, and it is a very peculiar kind of patriotism which leads hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite to ask us to make sacrifices while they propose to make no similar sacrifices themselves. I have not noticed in this House or in the country that the party opposite have failed to take credit for this war in their appeal to the patriotism of the people of this country. They have appealed to the people to support the present Government on party issues and have invited them to oppose the party on this side of the House. That seems to me to be a very peculiar and dangerous kind of doctrine. It was in the first place repudiated by the Leader of the House on Tuesday when he replied to my right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition on the Address, and was also expressly repudiated both by the Colonial Secretary and the Leader of the House during the late autumn session of Parliament. I remember a very striking passage in which it was said that the issues were no longer political but military, and that the Government invited criticism. If that is so it seems strange that they should protest and assert that the motives of the Opposition are unpatriotic in raising a debate on these questions. My object in rising is very much the same as that of the hon. Member for South Shields, who made a very brilliant speech the other night in this House. I am going to vote for this Amendment upon somewhat special grounds, and I prefer to do so not by a silent vote, and to explain my grounds for doing so. I entertain no shadow of a doubt as to the justice of the cause in which we are engaged with the Boer Republics. I need scarcely say that my belief is in no way affected by the success or reverses of the military operations which are necessary in order to carry that cause to a successful conclusion. As regards the declared policy of Her Majesty's Government during the spring and summer of last year, I supported that policy, and I still support it. That policy professed to secure proper treatment for the British subjects in the Transvaal, and I assert that it would have been a grave dereliction of duty if the Government had not pressed for that proper treatment to be secured. In the opinion of those best qualified to know, who have lived in that country and who have friends there, it is an almost unanimous opinion that the Transvaal was the only country where it was found to be a disadvantage to be an Englishman, and wherever British subjects receive treatment such as they received in the Transvaal, it is the duty of the Government of this country to interfere on their behalf, and this more especially in a country like the Transvaal, which is a comparatively new and recent state surrounded by a large number of British colonies. I say it was the duty of the Government to interfere both in the interests of these British colonies and in the general interests of the British Empire. I was glad the other day to hear my hon. and learned friend the Member for South Shields refer to the capitalists' argument in regard to this war. The argument that this is a capitalists' war, and that it is their cause we are fighting for, and therefore a sordid and mean cause, is an argument which I believe to be absolutely untrue. It is quite true of this war, as of every other war, that you cannot disentangle the interests of financiers from it. It was the case in the French, the Crimean, and the Egyptian wars, and I have no doubt that it is to that extent the case in this as well. Possibly some capitalists may have profited by this war. But there are many others who have suffered great losses, and the shrinkage in property must already have amounted to a very great sum indeed. The extent to which the capitalists have supported the Government policy, and preferred to risk the loss or depreciation of their property rather than submit to a continuance of the Government of the Transvaal, is one of the strongest indictments against the Transvaal Government that it is possible to find. What do these men risk? They risk the loss of their property and the stoppage of their businesses. And why have they done this? I do not suppose it is so much for their own interests and safety, because very few of these capitalists live in the Transvaal at all. But they employ English, Scotch, and Welsh miners who have gone out from this country for the purpose of seeking their fortunes in the Transvaal. These men have had to live there under conditions which they have found to be intolerable to any spirited or proud race, and therefore the capitalists were bound to come into line with the Uitlanders in the Transvaal. We have been told that a desire to grab the gold is at the bottom of this war. I should like to know in what way this war will give gold to this country. The large majority of the gold mines in the Transvaal are already owned by English companies, and they will be owned by the same people after the war is over. Those who say that this country is seeking territory for the purpose of acquiring goldfields show a great ignorance of the way in which we govern our colonies. What do we get out of other colonies in this respect? We should get just as much under the old system as we shall get under the British flag. Since the month of March, 1899, when the Government received and acted on the Uitlanders' petition, in broad principle their policy has been a right one, and it deserved and received the support both of this House and of the country. I might have found some difficulty in voting for this Amendment if it had been confined to impugning the justice of that policy since March, but it is not so confined, and simply indicts the Government for the want of foresight, knowledge, and judgment displayed since 1895, and I think since that time until March, 1899 they have displayed a want of judgment, foresight, and knowledge. It is this negligence between 1895 and 1899 which justifies me in voting for this Amendment. I think the Government have displayed a great deal too much of the quality of patience, which my right hon. friend the Member for Montrose advocates in dealing with this great evil. The plea as to this urged by the Leader of the House was the Jameson raid of 1895. Of course, everybody condemns that raid as a criminal blunder and a piece of mad and fatuous folly. It is, however, necessary to remember that the misgovernment of the Transvaal was not the result of that raid, but was anterior to it, and was going on during the administration of the late Government. The reform movement in the Transvaal was going on long before it was guided into the wrong and injudicious channel which culminated in the Jameson raid. The First Lord of the Treasury says that raid tied the hands of the Government, but why? If the Government were neither individually nor collectively guilty of complicity in that raid, and I believe that to be the case; if they were innocent why should the complicity of the Chartered Company—which had no connection with the Government except so far as it received powers of government for certain parts of South Africa—have prevented the Government from insisting upon the rights of this country and the rights of our subjects in the Transvaal? Immediately after the raid the Colonial Secretary had President Kruger in the hollow of his hand, for he was asked to exercise his influence to get Johannesburg to disarm. But why were no conditions imposed? Why did the Colonial Secretary not express his willingness to do that upon conditions properly guaranteed to the effect that the misgovernment of the Transvaal should be remedied, and that the reforms which were necessary should be carried out? The right hon. Gentleman framed a moderate and reasonable scheme, but President Kruger refused it, and thereupon the matter was dropped. Then the Government entered upon a long course of that panacea which has been recommended by the right hon. Member for Montrose, that is the policy of patience. They tried it so far as we were concerned, but simultaneously with it there was a constant arming of the Boers which has led to most of the present trouble, and the result of which we are experiencing to-day. Hon. Members on the other side say that this began before the raid and others say it began after, but whichever is true it is quite obvious that between January, 1896, and the ultimatum by the Transvaal and the Orange Free State last October there was an enormous accession to the military strength of the Boers, and, consequently, we now have to face one of the most formidable military operations ever undertaken by this country. We have already sent over 160,000 men, and we have not yet reached the object we have in view, and the Government have looked on and allowed all this to continue on account of the Chartered Company's complicity in the raid. That is no justification for it, and it is one reason why I shall vote for this Amendment, because it seems to me that the ordinary British citizen and "the man in the street" would say that we have to look to the Government of this country to protect us and our Empire, and the fact that they have not done so is not in the least justified because a trading company was guilty of a conspiracy at the time of the Jameson raid. So far as the preparations for war are concerned, I cannot imagine anybody asserting the converse of this proposition, and declaring that the Government have acted with knowledge, foresight, and judgment. We have heard of the military preparations and of the under-estimating of the number of troops required, the numbers and nature of our enemy, and their means of carrying on warfare. I believe that if it were not for the fact that the Amendment which is before the House involves the question of confidence in the Ministry, and if we could have the division by ballot a very large majority of the Members of this House would vote for it upon the grounds I have stated. In answer to this case, the Government put up two contentions, both of which seem to be absolutely self-contradictory. In the first place, they say that they thought war was unlikely, because the probability was that the Transvaal would give way at last. If this were the view generally taken, surely the business of a wise and prudent Government is to run no risks at all, and to provide even against the possibility of war, and the contingency that hostilities would result from the negotiations as they went on. But the fact remains that what the Government have done in this case has been that they allowed their diplomacy to outstrip their military preparations, and the excuse which the Under Secretary for War has given is extraordinary. He said that the reason the Government did not make more military preparations during the negotiations was because they did not want to hamper the diplomacy and, possibly, thereby precipitate hostilities. I do not think there is much justification for that hypothesis, because it is well known that the Boers were only waiting for the grass to grow in order that they might be able to operate with their mounted infantry on the plains of Natal. If Her Majesty's Government had sent out the troops in July there would have been much less risk of a declaration of war at all. The alternative contention put forward by the Government has now practically been given up—I allude to the suggestion that the Government did not know the Boer strength and the consequent reflection involved upon the War Office and the Intelligence Department, and Mr. Conyngham Greene. I do not think that was a contention which could possibly have held water for a moment in view of the facts. So far as regards the question of the administration of the War Office I am bound to say that I think the Government have a great deal to explain which they have not attempted to deal with, and which it is highly desirable not in the interests of party but in the interests of the people of this country that they should satisfactorily answer. After all, in these matters the man in the street represents very much the average opinion; most of us are ignoramuses on questions of military administration. [AN HON. MEMBER: No, no.] I speak with the assurance of ignorance myself, but I have not been above sitting at the feet of authority. I have sat out the Army Estimates every session since I have been a Member of this House, and I am bound to say that the impression produced on my mind by what I have heard on previous occasions from military experts in this House has not been removed by the admirable speech of the hon. Member the Under Secretary of State for War. But I attach a great deal more importance to the future than to the past. I attach more importance to the results which may follow this war than I do to re-creminations as to what has gone before. I hope that we shall have a silver lining to the dark cloud which has been hanging over us, if as the result of this war we get the people of this country and this House to recognise the deficiencies under which we are apparently labouring, and see that the proper remedy is applied to them. I have only to say that I am certain that the overwhelming majority of this House, and indeed of this country, are ready to support this war to the only conclusion to which, in my judgment, it ought to be pushed, the only one consistent with the national character of the British people. There will be nothing begrudged in the expenditure of money, and those fighting for us will not grudge the expenditure of blood for the purpose of carrying out the calls which their country makes upon them. But I think it is all important that we should see when this lamentable war has been carried to a conclusion that there shall be no possibility of the same mischief arising again and the same remedy having to be applied a second time.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I should like to say a few words on this subject before the debate is brought to a close, inasmuch as I happen to have been, during September, October, and November last, in the particular part of the world in which the events have happened which we are now discussing. In passing during those critical months through the districts of Cape Colony and the Orange Free State it was my pleasure to see a great number of persons. Although I should be very sorry to claim any expert knowledge of South Africa, I think, after having spent that very critical period amongst those persons, and having heard an immense variety of opinion there, I perhaps may be allowed to say a few words on this particular occasion. I candidly acknowledge that there is much that one might criticise concerning what has taken place if this was an occasion for a party battle, but I cannot help thinking that not only this country but all the colonies of South Africa—I will go further and say all the colonies of this great Empire—are looking for something much higher than the question of party battle. There is one thing we all want, and that is, to bring this war to a satisfactory termination. We want to bring it to such a satisfactory termination as will add dignity and power to this country and do justice to all parties in South Africa. That, in my opinion, can only be done by placing the whole of the country from the Zambesi to Cape Town under the British flag. What we should do here, and what the country is demanding is that we should consider how we can help to carry this out, and I am sorry to see that re-creminations have been raked up, and that various questions have been raised as to the merits of one side and the other, when all we ought to consider and think about is how to strengthen the Government in power to enable them to carry out this work to a successful conclusion. When the proper time comes there are many things that most of us will wish to inquire into. I fully agree that there are many things—possibly some unpleasant things—which we shall have to inquire about. I think it will be acknowledged that I have never been a very subservient member of this particular party, but I have always said most emphatically what I think and what I feel. I know this has not always been considered fashionable, and certainly it has not been very profitable. But there is a time for all things, and the present time and the present purpose demand something much higher than these party re-creminations. I think we should all combine with the Government with one end in view, and be alive to the enormous importance of the present position, because, as I have said, this is not merely a contest with regard to South Africa or the Transvaal; it is a contest fraught with issues that affect the whole position of our great Empire. The view I took in August and the view I take now, judging by the experiences of my visit to the Cape and what has happened since, is that these reverses or checks to our progress in the campaign will leave no permanent impression on the minds of the colonists unless the Government fails in its task and its duty to the nation. Now, we all know that our Army is an army capable of everything that a man can reasonably expect it to do; and it is to this House that the Army looks for sympathy and support. They are looking to us from all parts of South Africa in the expectation and hope that we will do our utmost to safeguard their interests. They desire that nothing should be left undone to strengthen their position, and nothing forgotten which will tend to save life. I would ask, Sir—and it is a fair question to ask at this critical period—are we quite certain that the Government are wholly alive to the gravity of the present position? I am bound to say that until I heard the speech of the Under Secretary of State for War I saw no indications that they were; but I must frankly say now, after the speech of this young member of the Government, that my fears have been dispelled. I should like to say a few words on one or two points raised in the speeches of several Members. One point that has been referred to more than once is as to the advance that was made on Dundee and Glencoe, and why Lady-smith has been made the Aldershot of Natal. Now, Sir, this is a very important question. I happened to be in Natal during the dreadful fortnight which preceded the landing of our troops from India. I do not want to exaggerate, but hon. Members sitting comfortably here can have no idea of the anxious feeling and tension that prevailed up to the Sunday; and after the troops came in people said to me: "To-day we can breathe again. Last Sunday we hardly dared to do so." I had come down from Johannesburg, and I had seen the Boer forces accumulating in thousands on the border, and there was nothing to stop them from raiding right down to Durban save the handful of troops we had up to that anxious fortnight. I think nobody will dispute that although the defence of Northern Natal may have been a military mistake, Sir George White, who accepted the responsibility of it, must be regarded as the hero of the campaign. While in Natal I saw a good deal of the Governor and of the Prime Minister, as well as of General Penn Symons, and I can easily understand why Sir George White surrendered his military judgment in order to place himself in the position in which he now finds himself in Ladysmith. He has 10,000 men there, and I still believe he will be relieved. He has exhibited a policy and behaved in a way which is a credit to the long line of honourable and gallant men whom he has followed; and I do sincerely trust that in criticising that military mistake we shall weigh well all the circumstances, and these cannot be adequately realised by any but those actually on the spot. Of course, it all comes back to the question—that very serious question which will have to be considered later—why Natal was not put into a state of preparedness when we knew that the Transvaal was arming to the teeth, and when we knew that their whole object was to take Natal. Yesterday I heard the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries, in which he said he considered that the grievances of the Uitlanders were practically nothing. It is very easy to consider persons' grievances as unimportant if you do not happen to suffer from them yourself. In this country it is a common spectacle to see Members of Parliament airing the grievances of some clerk or other who is not receiving the salary he ought to have; every little difficulty of his position is loudly proclaimed in this House. We consider it a monstrous injustice if the man's labour is not properly remunerated. I say that it is strange that we should sit here and calmly belittle the grievances of our fellow subjects in a far-distant country. I was in Johannesburg for four weeks, and I have no hesitation in agreeing with the hon. Member for South Shields as to the grievances under which the Uitlanders are labouring. I would like the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries, and the right hon. Member for Bodmin who sits here—I don't know why—to live in Johannesburg for twelve months; they would come back holding very different views, and would then know how to vote. The question of the war being one waged on behalf of the capitalists is, in my judgment, too absurd to be gone into. I cannot understand it. I am not a capitalist myself; but I think even a capitalist ought to be treated fairly and rightly. I took a great deal of trouble when in Johannesburg to find out some of the conditions and difficulties under which the capitalist lives. As the hon. Member has just stated, the capitalist is losing enormously by this war. There is no doubt about it; and when we hear that the men who have gone out to work in the mines are only "the scum of the earth," I say, emphatically, it is not true.

Third Day.

I went down the mines myself, and I can safely assert that the great bulk of the miners are as creditable a set of workmen as you will find anywhere. They are men of intelligence, their labour is strictly technical, and they have as much right to be protected as anyone. Moreover, it is said that these men are money-grubbers. How does that declaration agree with the fact that many of these men now form the best of our colonial troops? The work done by the Imperial Light Horse and Thorneycroft's Horse has been most excellent. They are soldiers of whom we need never be ashamed. Well, I have also heard of the difficulties raised by the Jameson raid. I do not wish for a moment to defend the Jameson raid and the part played in it by Mr. Rhodes. That is undoubtedly the weak spot in the whole South African case. But it must not be forgotten what led to this raid. I remember that when the Greeks talked about raiding Crete it was not considered a very great crime. And I also remember a certain telegram that was sent which did not show that raiding was always an iniquity. As to the raid being put forward as an excuse for the arming of the Transvaal, I may say that I was much interested in what I heard on the subject when I was there. I must candidly say that there was no concealment about the arming. It was common talk. I saw some of the men come in and walk off again armed with their guns; and although many thought then that war might be averted, the natural feeling was that war had been talked of for a long time. The point has been raised and referred to many times, whether the war was inevitable. Of course this also is quite an academic question. It does not matter much whether it was inevitable or not so far as getting done with it as soon as possible is concerned. But the subject should be carefully considered when the war is practically over—what were the circumstances which led up to it? First of all, there is the great question of race hatred and the corruption of the Boer Government. In this connection I think it is really remarkable, as instancing the state of affairs that has existed in the Transvaal, that a large number of the wives and families of Boers resident there, as well as in the Orange Free State, have absolutely been sent down to Capetown in order to be in safe keeping during the war. Now we can see the abominable condition of things the country is in when the Boers have to send their own wives and families down to British territory to be protected from their own kindred, whose character is to kill and destroy. One other question to consider is as to the future of these nations. It is too early to talk of the future; but we must be careful to protect the colonists, and to make it clear that we are determined that this state of things shall never happen again. In dealing with South Africa we have never permanently known our own mind. We have been continually changing our policy, first holding the country and then giving it back, and the loyal inhabitants have suffered in consequence. We must be absolutely supreme over the whole of these Republics, as we shall have no abiding peace until the Boer rule is absolutely gone. To refer for one moment to the Amendment proper. I think there are many of us who will agree with me that successive Governments have neglected their duty in regard to the preparations we should have made in South Africa. The present Government will agree now that not enough has been done to prepare for this serious war—not only by themselves, but by their predecessors. We have not done what we might have done since 1881. But that is no reason for adopting this Amendment, for that would certainly mean a change of Government. And whom should we put in instead? We should have to put those in position and power who have been worse than this Government have been, and that would be a leap from the frying-pan into the fire. Some of our opponents seem to think that we are fond of war; but there is not an hon. Member on either side of the House who does not hope that this war should be brought to an end. There are some of us who have our sons engaged in it, whose lives are in imminent danger; and we all feel, with the hon. and learned Member for South Shields, that this is a just war, despite its pains and penalties. We must not shrink from our duties, any more than our ancestors shrank from the duties that were placed upon them, and we must not falter in our determination to bring the struggle to a successful issue. Having done that, the future of South Africa will be a great one. By temporising now, we are only putting off the evil day, and I trust, therefore, that, in the interests of the country, as well as in the interests of the soldiers whose lives are at stake, the Government will do their utmost, in every way, to strengthen their hands, and not be wrapped up in the carping criticisms that we hear in certain quarters. Patriotism, I believe, will rise supreme over party feeling, and although I am sorry that we have not taken the advice proffered of ending the debate at once—I candidly say I should have been only too glad not to have spoken at all—the time has come when the only criticism on the Government, while the war lasts, should be such criticism as will tend to rouse them to prosecute it with their whole energy.

SIR EDWARD GREY (Northumberland, Berwick) : Some hon. Members and some organs of public opinion outside have sought to produce the impression that it would have been impossible for this debate to be initiated or to be continued if those who took part in it appreciated the seriousness of the situation in which the country is placed. I do not follow that reasoning. It is the seriousness of the situation which has produced this debate. I certainly—and I doubt whether any hon. Members of longer experience than mine can do so—cannot remember any time at which anyone who took part in debate in the House took part in it under a sense of such strict obligation to open his whole thought on the matter of the war. One of the advantages of the Amendment is that it makes that easy. But it is not easy to speak with the perfect freedom with which we ought to speak in such a serious matter without running the risks of alienating some friends and of offending more than usual the susceptibilities of some opponents. The first thing I wish to say to the House is one which I think will meet with general acceptance. I recognise that the speech of the Under Secretary for War is one which has given great support to the Government. I recognise that he made some points against this Amendment with great force, though I think his skill contributed greater force to those points than they were entitled to if considered only by the impartial mind; but I wish to express my gratitude to him, because he has perceptibly raised my own spirits.

It is true that it was mainly a departmental speech; it dealt in detail with important matters, but they were mainly departmental matters. It could not range over some of the wider issues of this question; it could not take the place of the responsible statement made by a Cabinet Minister on the whole situation; but it has done something to lift the gloom. It is the first thing that has happened since the Leader of the House spoke at Manchester in any way to dispel the gloom which has fallen on the country ever since. For that we are grateful. I will not enter into detail on the hon. Member's speech. I said that I was conscious of the seriousness of the situation. Let me clear one matter out of the way at the beginning. There is one thing, and one thing only, in this situation on which I look with a thoroughly light heart, and that is the differences of opinion which may exist among the Opposition. There are differences of opinion. We are all agreed that there has been great mismanagement on the part of the Government. But we recognise that we have differences of opinion with regard to the merits of the war; and this Amendment was not intended to cover all those differences of opinion or to conceal them. I freely admit that I am unable to bestride the chasm that separates my hon. and learned friend the Member for South Shields and my hon. and learned friend the Member for the Dumfries Burghs. I do not know whether to rejoice most that I am most closely associated with the sentiments of the hon. and learned Member for South Shields, or to regret that I am so far separated from the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries. But the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries rendered one very valuable service by his speech. I have said that this Amendment was not brought forward for purely party purposes. I think that everyone who listened to the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries and heard his emphatic denunciation of the committee appointed to inquire into the raid and all its proceedings, and who remembered how that committee was composed, will be the first to realise that it was not for party purposes that this debate was initiated. The Amendment is undoubtedly a vote of want of confidence. Does anyone, examining his own mind strictly on this matter, deny that the reputation of the Government for foresight, grasp, and efficiency, has been greatly impaired by the events of the last few months? It has been impaired; and it has to be redeemed. This Amendment is the expression of our sense of the tremendous extent to which our confidence has been impaired; but it leaves to us the earnest and sincere hope that that reputation may yet be redeemed. [HON. MEMBERS: Oh!] I hear the First Lord of the Admiralty throw some doubt on the sincerity of that hope.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I said that the Amendment would not leave you with the hope you express if you were to carry it.

SIR EDWARD GREY: Yes, Sir, but a Government whose reputation has once been impaired must be prepared to stand criticism, and its first opportunity of doing something to redeem its reputation is to meet that criticism in a better spirit than has yet been shown. That opportunity, at any rate, this Amendment provides. But first let me say to the House that I wish to justify myself for having expressed an earnest hope that that reputation would be redeemed. We cannot withhold our censure for what has passed, but we are prepared to give the Government our help in the future. [HON. MEMBERS: Oh!] I wish to be honest with the House, and to let the House and the Government know exactly for what we blame them, and exactly what the value of our support in the future is likely to be. This Amendment, though it is a vote of want of confidence, does not mean any desire to reverse the policy of the Government, or to weaken the prosecution of the war. We are prepared to help to prosecute the war to the end. The First Lord of the Treasury has sought to depreciate the value of the help which we might give by insinuating—for that is the proper word to use—that that help would be very limited; that it would stop at a certain point; that it would stop when the Boers were expelled from British territory. There is no warrant for that assumption. It was a construction of his own upon the words used. [HON. MEMBERS: No, no.] I am willing to refer him to other words, if he pleases, not uttered from this bench, but by a most important Member of the party on this side of the House. The hon. and learned Member for West Fife, speaking on no light and trivial occasion from a party point of view—at a meeting of the National Liberal Federation—described in glowing language his sense of the issue that was at stake. He said that in this war the fate of the whole Empire was at stake; and that we must press on until the British flag was flying at Johannesburg and Pretoria. Well, Sir, I think that is a statement as far-reaching as the right hon. Gentleman could wish for.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I entirely agree. If that statement represents the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition I have no criticism whatever to offer upon it.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I have given the right hon. Gentleman some instances of the value of the support likely to come from this side of the House. I have not yet given my own definition of the objects to be attained by the war. The primary object of this war—or of the policy which has ended in this war—was not to drive the Boers from British territory, because they were not on British territory at that time. The primary object was not to plant the British flag at Johannesburg or Pretoria. There are those who think these two things must be the results of the war; but they were not the primary objects of the war. Then what were the objects of the war? The objects which I wish to see attained, and in attaining which I pledge myself to give my utmost support to the Government, are mainly two. Others may arise afterwards, but there are only two which it is necessary for us to bear in mind at the present moment. The first is equal rights between white men in South Africa. By that I mean that never again, as far as it is humanly possible to prevent it, shall a situation arise in any part of the British sphere in South Africa in which a modern industrial community shall be placed by any possibility under the heel of an antiquated minority dominated by prejudice and governed by corruption. Let us make that impossible; let us ensure that into whatever districts South Africa may be divided, whatever arbitrary divisions there may be, in no circumstances whatever shall the government be out of sympathy with the majority of the white inhabitants. The second object is this—that never again in South Africa shall it be possible for an arsenal to be formed, and an accumulation of military material to be made, under any control except British control. Those are the objects in view; that is the end to be attained. To that end the Government will have our support.

Sir Edward Grey.

HON. MEMBERS: Oh!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: For whom do you speak?

SIR EDWARD GREY: I have quoted instances of the support likely to be given to the Government, but if the right hon. Gentleman chooses to challenge me, of course I speak only for myself. I am perfectly certain, however, that on this side of the House the large amount of support given to those objects is such that it justifies us in saying to the world at large that, in prosecuting those two objects, the support of the House and the support of the country will be given to the Government. Well, Sir, one thing more about the Amendment. The question of the merits of the war has been discussed on this Amendment. Of course that question comes well within the four corners of the Amendment, but it is not a necessary part of the Amendment. The hon. and learned Member for Dumfries made a speech yesterday so clear, so earnest, and so emphatic that he has laid upon others the necessity of being equally clear, earnest, and emphatic. I do not wish to extend the scope of the debate by arguing this question; and therefore I will ask the House to allow me simply to state my own view, and to leave argument on this point to another time. I have argued it elsewhere, and I am prepared to do so again; but there are more important matters now before us than the merits of the origin of the war. I have stated elsewhere, but I will state again, that in my opinion we are in the right in this war. It is a just war. It is a war which has been forced upon this country. I never will subscribe for one moment to what is so freely stated out of doors that in this contest the Boer Government, that oligarchy with its picturesque but antiquated prejudices, but whose agents of Government were corrupt—that that Government still stands for freedom and liberty in South Africa. That is intolerable, and I shall never subscribe to that, and I am willing to say I throw no odium on the Government for having provoked an unjust war—I do not believe that they have provoked the war—and I am willing to cheer them in their task. The arguments which I have used elsewhere I need not repeat. I pass now to the heart of the Amendment. Well, it is said that this Amendment, proposed at this early period of the session, will open the floodgates of public criticism; and it is remarkable that those who are most given to criticise the Government are those who are most given to indulging in this reproach; it is they who tell us that this Amendment opens the floodgates of criticism. Well, the organs to which I refer are not entitled to a monopoly of criticism of the Government, and it hardly rests with them to say that this Amendment opens the floodgates. I must appeal to the whole House at large whether in this matter, supposing no Amendment had been moved from the front bench at all, it would have been possible for the Government to begin the session without a large discussion. I hope that this Amendment will serve the purpose of clearing the air, and that it will at least supply ample opportunity to all sides of the House for expressing their views so that the House may, after, as I have said, the air has been cleared, go on to business. But consider the position those of us who are anxious to support the Government in the way I have stated in the future would have been in—consider the position we should have been in, having supported the Government, if we had withheld our criticism, if we had kept it in reserve with the intention of bringing it out at the most inconvenient time we could find afterwards. I think it is better, much better, that the criticism which we have to make should be made now. We can, therefore, having made our criticism now, give our support to the Government in carrying on this war with less apprehension of being misunderstood than if we withheld it until the period I have suggested. Will this discussion do any harm, any real harm—is it doing any real harm—to the interests of the country? The Under Secretary for War told us in the course of his speech that it would delay the statement which he was prepared to make to the House as regards the future. I was delighted to hear him allude to the future. The Under Secretary told us that he is to make this important statement, and I am glad, and I am sure the House is glad, that that statement is to be left in such skilful hands—in hands so congenial to the House. Is the Under Secretary prepared to make that statement now? When the Secretary of State was asked in another place whether he was prepared to make a statement of the kind referred to by the Under Secretary he replied that he was not in a position to name a day for the debate.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The House was empty.

MR. WYNDHAM: It is not usual to make such a statement in another place.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The Secretary of State did not say that. But there is a more important question than that. The question is, Is this discussion delaying any work that is to be done?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

SIR EDWARD GREY: If that be so, then I think that does clear us from the most serious charge. Our action is not delaying the work, and the Leader of the House assures us of that. The public interest, therefore, will not suffer, though the interest of the debate may suffer. As to the debate, that is a matter which rests in the hands of the House itself as a whole. Having cleared up that point, let me tell the Under Secretary for War, who expressed surprise in regard to this Amendment, that in my opinion those who are responsible for the very large amount of support which the Amendment has received are his own colleagues. Had the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, or any Minister of that rank, dealt with the situation before the session began in the spirit in which it has been dealt with to-night by the Under Secretary it would have taken away from many of us the impulse and the necessity to say some of the things which we have had to say in the course of this debate. But the speech which the First Lord of the Treasury made at Manchester was one which caused, not, I think, to me alone, the greatest pain that any public utterance has caused for some considerable time. What was the situation?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR made a remark which was inaudible.

SIR EDWARD GREY: Yes, and the impression that speech made, general as the impression was, still remains, because we have had nothing better than that speech from any Cabinet Minister since. What was the situation? The situation in which the right hon. Gentleman spoke was this. The country had been disappointed, perhaps dismayed—well, perhaps dismayed is too strong a word—but the country was deeply pained by the misfortunes which had taken place. It had been disappointed beyond all measure by the course of events in South Africa. The country was anxious about the course of events and about the fate of certain positions then in danger. The country in this critical time was looking to the first speech of a responsible Minister—it was looking with anxiety for a serious review of the war and the position in which the country was placed. It was looking for a serious statement as to what the means that were to be taken for the future were likely to be. If a statement had been made, if there had been an acknowledgment that mistakes had been committed, that the members of the Government, who are more conscious of these mistakes, and understand them better than anybody else, were prepared to draw from the past the lessons of experience necessary to redeem the future, anxiety would have been somewhat relieved. But instead of that the right hon. Gentleman in his speech did not deal with the situation from that point of view—he did not review it as a whole. He made a speech which had an air of pleasantry and fatalism about it, and inspired general distrust. It is not an unfair summary of that speech to say that it amounted to this—that nothing that happened could have been foreseen, or else the Government would have foreseen it. The Government took refuge behind all sorts of defences—behind public opinion, behind “the man in the street,” behind the Opposition. They have now taken refuge behind the Treasury and behind the British Constitution. Sir, we do not want a shower of excuses of the kind. The right hon. Gentleman began his speech by saying that the Government had nothing to apologise for—that was the last thing the country expected—and this was followed by one reason after another for not having foreseen events. The facts could not be denied, and these reasons were simply excuses. I remember one passage in the right hon. Gentleman's speech in which he dwelt with great emphasis upon the difficulty of sending out troops earlier to South Africa, and he said this was not done because it was feared they would not have the support of public opinion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No. If I remember that speech rightly—and I won't repeat the whole argument—what I said was this. I had believed that war was improbable, and that, under these circumstances, it would have been most unreasonable to destroy the chances of diplomacy by sending troops prematurely to South Africa. I hope the hon. Gentleman, who says he has read my speech so many times, will in that case quote it accurately.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The impression I gained from the speech was certainly that. If I can find the quotation afterwards I will give it to the right hon. Gentleman, but I am sure I am in the recollection of the whole country that statements have been made on behalf of the Government that they were unable to go in advance of public opinion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Quote them from my speech.

SIR EDWARD GREY: Here is the quotation—

“Supposing”—said the right hon. Gentleman—“we had come to Parliament in the middle of August and said, ‘We want you to vote us immense supplementary estimates for the provision of immediate transport to South Africa, we want you to call out the Reserves, and we want you to embody the Militia,’ what would have been the reply—not of the Opposition alone, not of the men who merely exist—politically exist, I mean—to take advantage, some argumentative or controversial advantage, of the Government that happens to be in power—what would have been said by the great mass of moderate opinion, both on the other side and on our own side of the House, if we had made such a proposition as that? I think I have enough knowledge of the House of Commons to tell you what would have been said. They would have said, in the first place, ‘The proposals you make to us are inconvenient and very costly.’”

Surely, Sir, that is public opinion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman has missed out the important passage. If he will read the preceding part he will see that that is hypothetical. I have not got the speech here, nor have I looked at it since it was delivered, but I feel sure that he will find that that is hypothetical. What I said was that we did not believe that war was likely or probable, but that if we had held a different opinion from the one we did hold, we should have been met with those statements.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The right hon. Gentleman has excited my sympathy; he has not read the report of his own speeches. I maintain that the hypothesis is exactly what I had put. It is that if you had taken a certain course, public opinion would have said to you that it is inconvenient—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope the hon. Gentleman will not think I am unduly interrupting him. I certainly do not mean to do so. But he is repeating a criticism—I will not say a foolish criticism, but one which I think has been illegitimately passed upon me—namely, the assumption that I stated as a fact what I stated as a hypothesis. It was a hypothesis.

SIR EDWARD GREY: Very well.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then do not state it as a fact. Do not say that we were influenced by fear of public opinion, or of the House of Commons, when, as a matter of fact, we were not influenced by it.

SIR EDWARD GREY : Well, all I can say is that it is a great pity that the right hon. Gentleman did not take the course which he says was a hypothetical course. The right hon. Gentleman certainly did shelter himself behind the man in the street. He said he had no more opportunity of knowing the intentions of the Transvaal than the man in the street.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : As regards going to war, yes.

SIR EDWARD GREY : Yes. It used to be, I think, one of the great merits of the old diplomacy that it prided itself on knowing, or on an intelligent anticipation of, the intentions of those with whom it was dealing. Now, in this matter the Government were the trustees for the nation, and it is not for them as trustees to say that those whose interests they held in trust knew no better than themselves. I will not labour those two points, but I do resent the British Constitution being brought into the matter. The British Constitution would lend itself to excusing anything which could be desired. It is easy to prove on paper that the British Constitution makes anything impossible and is absolutely unworkable. But the British Constitution is the most pliable and the most efficient institution in the hands of a powerful Government. With the British Constitution a powerful Government, with such a majority as the right hon. Gentleman has had, could have done anything, and our complaint against them—a complaint I have brought, not merely in respect to this matter, but others also—is that they have not ventured to use their large majority as they might have done. They have hoarded it ; they have endeavoured to preserve it rather than to make the use of it which circumstances demanded. And that has brought us to this point. If we are in the right in this war, how does it come about that the country is in such trouble? [HON. MEMBERS : Oh !] Holding as I do that we are in the right, I am entitled to ask, Why are we in such trouble? There was not foresight in the negotiations. I should like the right hon. Gentleman to explain how it was that he came in his speech at Manchester to say that there was in his mind a probability that the negotiations in which they were engaged might tide over war for a year. Supporting the Government with regard to these negotiations, I never for a moment imagined that all last summer, when we were discussing this question, any one in the Cabinet, in their minds, thought perhaps that a year stood between them and war. That, Sir, is the greatest condemnation which could have been made by any Minister of his own policy. If the nature of them was so delicate and narrow as that the negotiations would only stave off war for a year, why were the negotiations entered upon with so little preparation? The right hon. Gentleman does not dispute that construction of his speech. I have the quotation here.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I do not remember it, but I should like very much to hear it.

SIR EDWARD GREY : This is it—

“I do not say that you might not find here and there some prophet of evil who told us that, as soon as the grass grew, the Boers and their horses would be in the field. But if you considered, as we had to consider, the balance of competent opinion upon South African questions, while few men were rash enough to hazard the prophecy that South African questions would ultimately culminate in war, for the present, at all events, the probability was that we should obtain such rights for the Uitlanders in the Transvaal as should tide over the present year, the present difficulty, till perhaps a period arrived when, either by accident or design, it might suit the Boer leaders to precipitate the struggle from which they hoped, but vainly hoped, to reap so much for their national advantage.”

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : And you call that tiding it over for a single year.

SIR EDWARD GREY : What I said was that the right hon. Gentleman had stated that there was a probability that it might be tided over for the present year.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The hon. Gentleman has given my quotation. I have nothing more to say. I accept it.

SIR EDWARD GREY: It is the only conclusion, I think, to draw from that quotation, that possibly the negotiations might stave off war for a year. [HON. MEMBERS: No.] If there is any meaning in words at all it must mean that some preparation should have been made. [HON. MEMBERS: No.] The one thing that could excuse want of preparation is want of knowledge of the Boer army. I was delighted to hear from the Under Secretary for War this evening his complete exoneration of the Intelligence Department. Too long that department has lain under an unjust suspicion, for it now appears that the information it gave as regards the men and the guns of the Boers was accurate and complete. The question we have to ask is, Why did not the Government profit more by that intelligence? And again, How is it that the Government are so divided as to the intelligence which was given? Hon. Members seem surprised that we on this side of the House should be united on this Amendment. It is far more strange that the Cabinet cannot be united as to what they were really told by the Intelligence Department as to the armaments of the Boers. To come now to the military question. We have been told that the generals have been given a free hand. I accept that statement as true. But I should like to know from what time it dates. When were the generals given a free hand? What, for instance, diverted General Buller from the original plan? We have been told "the unhappy entanglement of Ladysmith." Ladysmith, indeed, has been more than an unhappy entanglement—it has been the pivot of disaster. Speaking as a layman, it seems obvious to me that the great ally to have on your side in war is time; and the most formidable opponent to have against you is time. We assumed that in this war time would have been on our side. But the unhappy entanglement of Ladysmith has put time against us, and has brought us disaster. Where, then, is the responsibility to lie for that unhappy entanglement? The military criticism, made by a great military authority—else I would not quote it—is that—

"The disposition of the frontier garrisons had been carelessly made in South Africa. This disposition should have facilitated the concentration and distribution of the Army Corps at whatever basis and upon whatever line of advance the general in chief might choose—in other words, that the disposition of the frontier garrisons should have conformed to the needs of the Army Corps, but what actually happened is that the Army Corps had to conform to the needs of the frontier garrisons."

What I should like to know is, was that disposition of the frontier garrisons in accord with the instructions of the military authorities at home? Was there any difference between the colonial authorities and the military authorities at home on that question? The responsibility in this matter is most serious, and what I ask is, was this disposition of the frontier garrisons made with the entire consent of the military authorities at home?

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes.

SIR EDWARD GREY: Then I am prepared to say the best was done under the existing circumstances.

MR. WYNDHAM: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. Baronet, but I think he is inferring from our assent more than should be properly inferred from it with regard to the military authorities at home. I ought to tell him and the House that the defence of Glencoe and Dundee was done on the initiative and under the control of the late General Symons. I only wish to correct the hon. Baronet if he draws the inference that that was done on the direction of the military authorities at home.

SIR EDWARD GREY: That is important. In the case of a great campaign the most natural supposition would be that the disposition of the frontier garrisons would not have been made by those on the spot without the sanction of those at home, upon whom rests the responsibility for the arrangements. Yes, that is not unnatural in these days of the telegraph. I gather that the military authorities at home were not consulted with regard to Glencoe and Dundee.

MR. WYNDHAM: They were not consulted. We first learned of the defence of Glencoe and Dundee from the newspaper accounts.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I will leave the matter to be discussed by expert military authorities. But it seems to me that in the organising of a great campaign the people on whom rests the responsibility for carrying out the campaign should have exercised the closest scrutiny on the disposition of the frontier garrisons.

MR. WYNDHAM: How is it possible to supervise an action you did not anticipate?

SIR EDWARD GREY: Surely the campaign ought to have been more carefully planned. Ought the disposition of the troops at the opening of the campaign to have been in such a way that the authorities at home could not anticipate an important move? But it is impossible to clear up the matter this evening.

MR. WYNDHAM: I dislike very much interrupting the hon. Baronet, but I think he will see that the military authorities at home may have their own idea as to what the disposition of the troops should be, and may see that that disposition is made. But if the officer in command on the spot, on his own authority, alters that disposition, I think they would be held to be right in being chary in interfering with his subsequent movements.

SIR EDWARD GREY: Certainly, when the war has begun, but not before the war has broken out. That is the point in the disposition of the frontier garrisons. Now, I want to pass from the military point to a criticism which I think is very relevant and which I think justifies the position we take. What is the great mistake which has been made? It is a cheap reproach to bring against the Opposition that they are wise after the event. Really, what we want to be sure about is that the Government themselves are wise after the event. It seems to me that even if it comes after the event it is still worth some attention. What is the great mistake which has been made throughout this South African question? It has been this. There were two factors of great importance in the situation in South Africa during the last few years. One was the grievances of the Uitlanders, and the second was the growth of the military power of the Transvaal. Of those two factors the growth of the military power of the Transvaal was the more important, but the Government concentrated their attention on the grievances of the Uitlanders. They ought to have taken up the question of the growth of the military power. They began their negotiations about the Uitlanders. It would have been serious to have such military force accumulating in any hands but our own, or in the hands of others, however friendly they were. But to have them in the hands of people who were known to be ill-disposed to us, who had given us evidence of their ill-will on many occasions, was a great mistake. Why was no protest entered against the armaments? The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has told us that the hands of the Government were tied by the raid. We never realised till the last few weeks the full misery of the raid. We never realised how much the hands of the Government were tied till we had speeches made telling us what a large share the ill-reputation incurred by the raid has had in preventing necessary action in South Africa. But the question which lies with all of us is this: If the consequences of the raid were so evil, why did not the Government do more at the time to clear us from those evils? Why the delay in the inquiry? Why the repression and the keeping back of certain things when the inquiry was completed? I admit entirely the argument which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Monmouth used at the time which weighed with the Committee, but I see now the pity that the thing was not cleared up at the time it was brought before the Committee. What we fixed on were mere dregs, but they have made it possible for everyone of suspicion, for everyone inside this country or outside of it who is ill-disposed to the Government or those connected with the raid, to stir up those dregs and excite suspicion. And when the Committee was over we felt the pity of the speech which was made in debate, the speech of the Colonial Secretary, with too strict and narrow a definition of the rules of honour—too narrow a definition unfortunately at any time, but doubly unfortunate at that time—because every word which was used to lighten, to mitigate the censure which was being passed on the authors of the raid, every word which was used to rehabilitate the authors of the raid, only made heavier the load which the Government was carrying and which was paralysing their action. Well, if they could not for shame of the raid enter a protest against the arming of the Transvaal, I ask why did they not put the British possessions in South Africa in a state of defence? If they could not for shame say to the Transvaal Government, "You must cease your armaments," why did they not put the British possessions in a state of defence? That brings me back to the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury as to the difficulty there would be in sending troops earlier. I admit that difficulty after negotiations, but why was it not done before negotiations began? Would there have been a difficulty about public opinion? ["Yes."] No, not if the Government had stated the facts of the case. Yes, Sir, public opinion in so many of these matters is waiting for the Government to lead, but it now turns out that the Government have been waiting to be led. When the negotiations were once commenced it was difficult to send troops, and the hon. Member the Under-Secretary for War himself told us how they felt hampered at the War Office when negotiations were proceeding in sending out troops. I remember him telling the House in October, in excellent language, that the Government forbore to threaten while they were committed to persuade. If the Government had come down to the House in July and announced that they were going to send out troops at once, I admit that there would have been a charge against them that they were imperilling a peaceful issue, that the issue between a five and a seven years franchise was not worth fighting about. That was a false issue, but the Government had started the negotiations, and though I admit to the full the difficulty the negotiations made in putting our possessions in a state of defence, the difficulty was one of the Government's own making. The mistake was that they took up the grievances of the Uitlanders, knowing that there was risk in the negotiations, when they ought before they entered on those negotiations to have put our possessions in a state of defence. Now, Sir, in conclusion, I have made my criticisms. I regret very much that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury should have thought that I have placed an unfair construction on his words, but I cannot understand his language in any other sense than that I have endeavoured to convey. Whether this criticism of the action of the Government will do harm or good, and I think it will do more good than harm, it was impossible to pass over what has happened without survey. For the future, what is before us? The prosecution of the war with vigour, power, and success? Yes, but more than that, the taking of such measures as may protect the country against complications that may arise, and which, if they do arise, shall find this country in a stronger position. In all that I will give my help to the Government, in spite of the criticisms I have passed upon them, and which I was bound in honour to pass. In spite of that, I should like for the future to give to the Government in this question not only my help but my confidence. I should be delighted to reserve all differences of opinion in the future for home affairs; but we can have no confidence in the Government while the spirit of their speeches is such as that I have criticised this evening. The right hon. Gentleman's own comments on the criticism passed upon him was that it was party criticism. It is not party criticism. Read the organs of public opinion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I never said it was party criticism; I said it was unfair.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The criticism was not purely party criticism. I am quite willing to accept the right hon. Gentleman's own construction of what his meaning was. It was not party criticism. It was something much more serious. It was a cry of distress from the whole nation. There is no disquiet to be found in the spirit of the nation at this moment. It is full of power, it is energetic. The whole nation is moved, but the question which makes the country anxious is what power there is in the Government. Individual ability in the Cabinet is not denied, but there must be some mind which co-ordinates, which guides and controls the individual ability and subordinates it to the policy of the whole. We have not seen the work of that mind in the action of the Cabinet. We have not felt the confidence which the country would feel in a Cabinet controlled by one guiding mind inspiring the whole. I cannot control the past. I look to the future. I express my sense of obligation for the speech of the Under Secretary for War to-night, and I do implore members of the Government like the First Lord of the Treasury and others who may speak in this debate to give us something better than we have yet had, something to show that they are more worthy trustees of the interests of the country. If they will appeal to the House in that spirit I believe they will meet with ample support, because I believe that in the House, as a whole, that patriotism with which the whole country is stirred is shared to the full.

MR. SPEAKER was about to put the Question, when

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made and Question proposed,
"That the debate be now adjourned."
--(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This is rather unusual. We have had a most interesting and important debate. It was an open secret, if it is to be described as a secret at all, that the Government have desired throughout that this debate should be curtailed to the narrowest limits. That has been the desire of the Government; I gave notice of it last night and I gave notice of it to-night in answer to a question. As the House is aware, the authorised ambassadors of the two front benches could not come to an agreement that the division should take place before Tuesday, and I think that it is very deplorable and unfortunate. I should have thought, under the circumstances, that that fact carried with it the obligation that some course should be taken with regard to the progress of the debate by the party which desires this postponement. In any case, I think some gentleman ought to get up and continue the debate.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN:
According to the invariable conduct and
Sir Edward Grey.

courtesy of debate, when, in a debate of this kind, an hon. Member has spoken on one side, we look to the other side to follow. There is no lack of hon. Members on the other side who have shown a desire to take part in the debate, and the only conclusion I can come to is that those hon. Members who were going to make such long speeches thought that thirty minutes before the adjournment would not be sufficient to enable them to develop their theories on this subject. I venture to say that the desire of the Government that this debate should be closed as soon as possible is very natural, because the debate is directed against the Government. At the same time it is usual in a debate of this kind that the supporters of the Government should take their fair share in it, if, indeed, they have anything to say in support of the Government.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY (Yorkshire, Shipley): The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition is, in my opinion—

MR. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I rise to order. What is the Question before the House?

*MR. SPEAKER: The Question is that the House do now adjourn.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: In that case I will reserve what I have to say.

MR. STUART: Mr. Speaker, we are perfectly justified in pressing this motion for the adjournment on this ground. After the speech of the hon. Baronet, the Member for Berwick, a most remarkable speech which has been listened to with great interest and followed closely by all Members of the House, we sat still. A remarkable indictment has been brought against the Government, and we have waited in the full expectation that some member of the Cabinet was about to rise and explain the position they held in answer to that speech. I hope my hon. friend will press for the adjournment of the House so that we can get an answer to that speech.

Question put.

 Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: I am very glad that this debate has now been raised beyond the level of a mere party discussion. During last session the silence which was observed on these benches was due to the self-denial and self-repression of private Members. We desired that the purpose for which the House was called together should be accomplished in the shortest possible time, and that supplies of men and material should be voted as quickly as possible. There were no doubt exceptions to that rule. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin had not then been disavowed as he has been since by his constituents in this matter. He had not then been acting as chairman of a meeting in London at which cheers were given for President Kruger, as he was last night. There were other exceptions also in the ranks of the supporters of the Ministry, but in the main private Members desired to do what was necessary in silence, in order to avoid wasting valuable time. In the present session valuable time has been wasted during the last two days. The question has been debated from the standpoint of party recrimination, and has not been raised to the level which under the circumstances it should attain. What is the position of the country at the present time? Ten thousand of our countrymen are beleaguered in Ladysmith, being possibly on the verge of starvation and surrender; the valour of 30,000 of the flower of our troops has not succeeded in rescuing them, and their fate—and they deserve well of the country—is trembling in the balance. Our troops are not only checked at Colenso but also at a place about fifteen miles from Kimberley. Parliament has been summoned earlier than usual in order to meet that situation; and what has Parliament been doing, until by the speeches of the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, and the Under Secretary of State for War, the matter has been lifted to the level it fairly deserves? Has Parliament taken patriotic counsel, has it sought to do something towards the avoidance of national disaster, has it been considering the immediate strengthening of our Army in the field, or the supply of further guns and transport for the quick termination of the war? No, Sir, Parliament has been engaged, on the initiative of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, in miserable party animosity and party disputation as to who was to blame for the war, and who should have sent out larger reinforcements at an earlier date. I should not be surprised if that impartial personage described by the Leader of the Opposition as "the ordinary Englishman," and by the Leader of the House as "the man in the street," were disgusted with the conduct of Parliamentarians at the present time, and was to say with Shakespeare: "A plague on both your Houses!" The motion of the noble Lord the Member for the Cricklade division was blessed with the preliminary benediction of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, but he did not give any promise of moral or material support in the prosecution of the war, his speech being a mere bid for popular favour—resting, as I allege, upon a reversal of his own words in this House and of words which he addressed to the country. Not one word of advice fell from the ex-Minister for War in his opening speech, nor a promise of assistance—nothing but an attempt to make political capital out of a situation full of national danger, and possibly of national disaster. Nero fiddled while Rome burned, and somehow one is reminded of it by the attitude of the Opposition in face of this national crisis. But Nero at least knew his own mind, and I am not so sure that I can say as much for the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition. On 21st April last he protested in this House against the increase of our troops in Natal.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: On the contrary. The only time I made a speech about troops in Natal was on a question which involved the permanent retention of a large body of troops in that colony, and on that occasion I said that I was not one to put difficulties in the way of the removal of troops by responsible Ministers, who were the sole masters of the disposal of Her Majesty's forces.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: May I remind the right hon. Gentleman that when the Colonial Secretary stated that the troops in Natal for defensive purposes were to be increased from 3,000 to 9,000 he protested against that increase. In July last the right hon. Gentleman used these words—

"From the beginning of this story to the end of it I can see nothing whatever which furnishes a cause for armed intervention."

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have several times within the last two days stated that the words I used were in connection with the whole of the negotiations with reference to the Uitlanders' grievances, the franchise, and so forth, and I stated that there was nothing that could constitute a casus belli in them. There may have been other reasons of which I was ignorant.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: And yet the right hon. Gentleman complains of greater preparations not having been made. That appears to the mind of the ordinary Member to be an inconsistency. I quote further. At Maidstone on October 6th the right hon. Gentleman used these words—

"I can discern nothing to justify either war-like action or even military preparations."

Was that part of the foresight in which hon. Gentlemen opposite accuse the Government of having been deficient? Four days before war broke out and the Queen's dominions were invaded, the right hon. Gentleman said that he then saw no reason why there should be military preparations.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The whole burden of our complaint is that the Government had knowledge on the subject which was not open to us. We did not know of the Boer preparations or the danger of the position.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: I do not deny that the right hon. Gentleman was not in a position to obtain information possessed by the Government, but even so late as last Tuesday the right hon.

Third Day.

Gentleman said he saw no reason for military preparations at the time.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN :
On any ground that we knew.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY : I honestly and sincerely think that the right hon. Gentleman, when he stated four days before war broke out that he then saw no reason for military preparations was showing the same want of foresight—even allowing for the difference of knowledge between a man in office and a man out of office—as that of which he is now accusing the Government. The right hon. Gentleman in his speech last Tuesday accused the Government of having sent dribblets of troops into Natal. I presume by that, that he thinks the troops should have been sent in large numbers; but if they were sent in large numbers it is a truism to say that that would have destroyed the very last chance of a peaceful settlement. But if these troops had not been sent what would have happened? Why, Sir, the Boer plan of campaign, which was to sweep over the whole colony of Natal and to take possession of Durban, would undoubtedly have succeeded, and then we should have been faced with an almost impossible task, because anyone who knows Durban knows that it is full of impregnable positions commanding the entrance to the harbour, and that it would have been almost impossible even for the British Navy to capture it if it fell into the hands of the enemy. That was prevented by sending to Natal the dribblets of troops of which the right hon. Gentleman complains. I hold no brief for the War Office. It is a tradition—a wise and chivalrous tradition, no doubt—that Ministers should protect Government officials in the departments for which they are responsible. I am under no such obligation. Speaking, however, in the absence of those responsible for the War Office—although the First Lord of the Treasury by gesture assumes the responsibility for the moment—I have some delicacy in apportioning blame for some of the details in which the military preparations were lacking. I desire to do justice to the War Office, as I am sure every hon. Member of the House does. I think there is infinite credit to be given to the War Office for having despatched over 100,000 troops a distance of over 6,000 miles with such remarkable smoothness and almost unbroken success. The mobilisation of the Reserve and the embodiment of the Militia seem to me to indicate the most careful preparation and forethought, and notwithstanding allegations emanating from hon. Gentlemen opposite, the supplies of ammunition and clothing are in marked contrast to the state of things during the Crimean War. But the root of all our disappointment has been, I venture to say, lack of complete intelligence. We were told in the excellent speech delivered by the Under Secretary of State for War that the number of the Boers had been estimated at something like 59,000. I ask where is the proof that that estimate is correct? There was published not many weeks ago a letter which purported to have been written by General Joubert to a correspondent on the Continent. In that letter General Joubert stated that he recognised at least two British Agents, and that he showed them only that part of the armament possessed by his Government which was old and obsolete, and that he hid carefully from them the new guns.

It being midnight the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed to-morrow.

Adjourned at one minute after Twelve of the clock.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR — SURVEYS AND MAPS.

LORD SALTOUN: My Lords, I rise to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, when the war broke out, the officers of the Field Force had maps of the Transvaal and Orange Free State served out to them; also, as the war has been so far carried on in our own territory of Cape Colony and Natal, whether maps of these Colonies have been served out, or are now being served out, to them by the Government. The other day, during the debate on the Address in reply to Her Majesty's Gracious Speech, the Minister for War stated, in answer, I think, to Lord Rosebery, that the Government were so prepared that they had sent a large force of 120,000 men, fully equipped, out to the Cape in the course of a few weeks. I regard this as a most notable performance, and the thanks of the country are due to the Government for it. But there is one piece of equipment which is most essential to our troops when operating in what may be called a hostile country—namely, the maps of that country. Since I placed my question on the Paper of your lordships' House I have read a most excellent speech by the Under Secretary for War, in which he gave an explanation to a certain extent of the surveys which had taken place and the maps which had already been distributed. But, my Lords, he did not go further back in his statement on this subject than 1896, in which year two officers, he stated, went out to survey certain tracts of the country. He also pointed out the enormous size of the country which had to be surveyed, and the great difficulties in the way. But what I wish to call attention to is this, that 1896 was not the beginning of the period when we should have begun to look towards the crisis in which we now find ourselves. It is not only from the date of the Jameson raid, but from the date of the most disastrous and ignominious treaty made after Majuba Hill that we ought to have begun to prepare for this war. Everyone in this country—every “man in the street”—must have known that at some future time war was bound to break out between us and the Boers, and I think it was the duty of the Government of that day, and of future Governments, to have provided not only maps of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State, but also maps of Cape Colony and Natal. I would remind your lordships of the terrible lesson which the French received in the Franco-German War. They had excellent maps of the whole of Germany, but, when the war was carried into French territory, the French troops failed ignominiously because they had no maps of their own country to work upon. Ladysmith, as is well known, I believe, to everyone in your lordships’ House, is called the Aldershot of Natal, and it is, in my judgment, quite inexplicable, in view of the importance of Ladysmith to us as a great storehouse of food and munitions of war, that there was no map extant showing the correct position of Spion Kop. I do not wish to ask any question which would in any way interfere with the interests of the country or with the Government at this critical moment, but I think it is most essential that the information for which I ask should be known to the public. My attention was called to this subject owing to the very severe criticisms which had been made by General Buller on the scouting of various officers in various parts of Cape Colony and Natal. If these officers had had good maps of the country in which the war is being carried on, I feel certain that they would have been able to carry out their work with greater advantage and much more easily. The Under Secretary for War stated that they had the Cape survey and the Colonial map of Natal. If the Colonial map of Natal does not even state accurately where Spion Kop is, what can you expect from the Colonial map of Cape Colony? I think they must both be very poor, and not such maps as our officers ought to rely upon in this war. I now venture to put my question to the noble Marquess, and in doing so I would like to add that it is not only the commanding officers to whom I allude, but all officers from the chiefs down to the youngest subaltern.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): My Lords, I do not think that your lordships will differ from the noble Lord in the importance which he attaches to the possession of accurate maps by any force operating in the field. I gather that he complains of the War Department because it did not address itself some years ago to the task of obtaining accurate maps of the different parts of South Africa. In these matters we are very apt to be wise after the event, and it is possible that, in the years to which he referred, more might have been done in the way of surveying important regions. But I have no doubt that it occurred to many people in those days that the duty of making topographical surveys of the British colony concerned primarily the colony itself rather than the Imperial Government; but, at any rate, of late years I do not think we are open to the reproach of having neglected this duty. The noble Lord asks me whether, when the war broke out, the officers of the Field Force had maps of the Transvaal and Orange Free State issued to them. The answer to that is that maps of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State were issued to officers when the war broke out. These maps formed part of the Intelligence branch maps, and are on the scale of four miles to the inch. The noble Lord next asks me whether lately maps of Cape Colony and Natal had been served out, or are now being served out to the troops by the Government. As to that, I have to say that the General Officer in command in South Africa has been instructed to issue to the troops maps of Cape Colony and the neighbouring territories. This map is on the scale of 12½ miles to the inch, and it is published at Cape Town. With regard to Natal, we have supplied from here a very large quantity of sheets of the survey which has recently been made by our own officers of the northern portion of Natal. The noble Lord is quite correct when he says that that map does not include the whole of the country around Ladysmith. The survey comes as far south as, and a little further south than Ladysmith, but it does not take in the valley of the Tugela at that point which we are now watching with so much interest. This, no doubt, is to be regretted, but the answer to the criticism is that as much of the survey was completed as it was possible to complete in the time at our disposal. Besides that map a large number of copies of Russell's map of Natal on the scale of five miles to the inch have been issued. I may say, in reference to the noble Lord's observation that the position of Spion Kop is inaccurately shown on some of these maps, that so far as I am able to ascertain Spion Kop is a very common name for an eminence in the whole of that part of South Africa, and there appear to be a considerable number of Spion Kops located on different parts of the map. Besides the maps to which I have referred, we have issued a number of copies of Bartholomew's well-known small-scale map of South Africa, a great number of special maps and plans of reconnaissances of various points of military importance. I may say, in reference to the general tenor of the noble Lord's remarks, that the area of the region which may be, I think, properly described as the theatre of war is something like 400,000 square miles, and it would have been beyond the power of our officers to survey anything like the whole of that region within the time at their disposal.

"To amend the Law relating to Outdoor Relief in sickness and widowhood to the Provident Poor," presented and read the first time; to be read a second time upon Wednesday, 21st March, and to be printed. [Bill 62.]

QUESTIONS.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—THE HAGUE CONFERENCE AND ARBITRATION.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will consider the advisability of acting on its own suggestion made at the Hague Conference, and agree to resort to arbitration with a view to bring the war in South Africa to a speedy and satisfactory end.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The proposal made by the British Plenipotentiary at The Hague for the establishment of a permanent court of arbitration does not appear to Her Majesty's Government to be applicable in the present circumstances.

SIR WILLIAM BUTLER'S DESPATCHES.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether General Sir William Butler made to the War or to the Colonial Office any statement or communication as to the amount and character of the forces the Boers could put into the field in the event of war, or as to the extent and character of their armaments, or as to the special military difficulties to be overcome, and the best disposition of the British forces, or other steps advisable to meet those difficulties; and whether such statement or communication will be presented to Parliament.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is nothing, I believe, in any of Sir W. Butler's despatches to the War Office dealing with the amount and character of the forces that the Boers could put into the field in the event of war, or as to the extent and character of their armaments. There were some observations in the despatches of June last as to the distribution of the small British force then in the colony, and in those suggestions there were probably references to the special military situation of the district; but, so far as I know, there is nothing in those despatches relative to the controversies which have divided us in our recent debates upon military matters.

MR. CHANNING: Were the suggestions made in the document referred to adopted or rejected by the Committee of Defence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will look into that matter, but I should think that probably they were adopted.

MR. W. REDMOND (Clare, E.): As there is so much interest in this matter, could the right hon. Gentleman see his way to have Sir W. Butler's despatches placed in full on the Table of the House?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I answered a question of exactly the same purport yesterday in the negative.

CANADA'S OFFERS OF TROOPS.

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to a recent statement attributed to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Prime Minister of Canada, to the effect that several months ago Canada offered to furnish this country with a second contingent of troops, and that Her Majesty's Government declined the offer, and in declining it informed the Canadian authorities that should they require more Canadian troops they would want infantry and not cavalry; and whether this statement accurately or substantially represents what occurred; and, if so, upon what grounds the Government founded their reply to the Canadian offer.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Her Majesty's Government declined the offer of a second Canadian contingent under present circumstances on November 6th last. In doing so no such statement as the hon. Member suggests was made. At an earlier date—namely, October 2nd—as fully explained by my hon. friend the Under Secretary for War last night, the War Office expressed a preference for colonial infantry as compared with colonial cavalry.

THE JAMESON RAID.—THE RHODES-HAWKSLEY CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to a letter, written on the 20th February, 1897, by the solicitor to the British South Africa Company to Earl Grey (a director of the Company and the Administrator of Rhodesia) in which the former states that the cables of the last half of 1895, or rather the negotiations of that period, would probably have to come out, and that if they did the Secretary of State for the Colonies would have no one but himself to blame; and whether he will state to the House what the cables and negotiations referred to were, or whether he will lay them upon the Table of the House.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The reply to the first question is in the affirmative. My attention has been called to the letter referred to. I have not had time to verify the correctness of the description given by the hon. Member, but I will take it for granted it is correct. In answer to the second question, it is not easy for me to explain communications which passed between two third parties in the year 1897, and of which I had no knowledge at the time. But I assume that the cables referred to, or some of them, were those which Mr. Hawksley declined to produce. If so, they formed part of a batch which was sent to me in 1896 for confidential perusal and return, and which were accordingly returned almost immediately with a letter stating that I had no personal objection to their publication. I believe that the majority of this batch of telegrams was subsequently produced by the cable company acting under the orders of the South Africa Committee. As I have had none of them in my possession since 1896 I am unable to lay them on the Table.

MR. S. T. EVANS: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether or not he kept copies?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No, Sir, certainly not; I should have thought that not quite honourable.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Were they shown to the Attorney-General?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not know.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs): Who is it that objects to the publication?

MR. CONYNTHAM GREENE AND THE COLONIAL SECRETARY.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, why, when Mr. Conyngham Greene, C.B., visited the Colonial Office on the 6th November, was the late Agent of the British Government at Pretoria not accorded an interview with the Colonial Secretary; when Mr. Rhodes visited the Colonial Office on the 6th February, 1896, immediately after the Jameson raid, was he received by the Colonial Secretary in a private interview which lasted for two hours, and at which no official except Lord Selborne was present; and what is the reason that a courtesy given to Mr. Rhodes after the raid was denied to Mr. Conyngham Greene.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The first statement is based on inaccurate information. I did not see Mr. Conyngham Greene on the 6th November, because I had arranged to see him on the 10th November, a day which was more convenient to both of us. I have had the fullest conversations with him since his return. The answer is in the affirmative, except that I think the interview was much shorter than two hours. It is not usual for the officials of the Colonial Office to be present at private interviews.

INTERVENTION OF FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have any information relative to any communications which have recently passed between the Government of the Netherlands and any other foreign Powers with reference to the hostilities now proceeding in South Africa, or to the mutual relations of European Powers in respect thereto.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (MR. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The answer is no, Sir.

CONTRABAND OF WAR—THE RIGHT OF SEARCH.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have observed the statement made by Count von Bülow in the German Reichstag, on 19th January, to the effect that Her Majesty's Government had issued instructions to British cruisers not to stop or search for contraband of war any vessels either at Aden or at any point equally or further distant from the seat of war; that Her Majesty's Government had further issued instructions that German mail steamers are not to be stopped and searched on mere suspicion:

and that Her Majesty's Government had declared its assent to the institution of a court of arbitration for dealing with claims for compensation arising out of the exercise of the right of visit and search; whether this statement accurately represents the engagements taken by Her Majesty's Government; and if so, whether he can state the considerations which have induced Her Majesty's Government to waive in these respects the exercise of the maritime rights of this country; whether he can state on what ground it is intended to withdraw from the prize courts, and to submit to arbitration the assessment of costs and damages to be paid by captains in respect of capture without adequate cause; and whether he will lay any Papers with reference to this matter upon the Table of the House.

*MR. BRODRICK: Her Majesty's Government have undertaken not to search vessels for contraband of war at the distance named in the question, because there is nothing to prevent contraband being shipped at intervening ports after such search, and the cargo destined for intervening ports interferes with effective search. Mail steamers having important public interests to serve will not be arrested unless there are grounds beyond mere suspicion for believing there is contraband on board. The assessment of compensation in connection with the seizure of vessels cannot be withdrawn from the prize court except on application by the parties and consent of the court. Her Majesty's Government have not surrendered any right, but in view of the representations of the German Government and the assurances given by the Mail Steamer Company that they had given strict orders that contraband should not be carried, Her Majesty's Government have undertaken, pending further arrangement, not to arrest such vessels except on the gravest suspicion. I propose to lay Papers on the subject shortly.

THE DEFENCE OF NATAL.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthen-shire, W.): On behalf of the hon. Member for the Gainsborough Division of Lincolnshire, I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War by whose advice Lady-smith and Dundee were chosen as the best sites for the defence of Natal; and whether these sites were selected with the approval of the military advisers of the Government.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. WYNDHAM, Dover): The correspondence published by the Colonial Office shows the ground which led the late General Sir W. Penn Symons to decide to occupy Dundee. It is impossible in the limits of an answer to a question to state the events which resulted in Sir G. White's investment in Ladysmith.

GUNS OF POSITION.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether there were any guns of position, and, if so, how many, in Natal and Cape Colony prior to the outbreak of hostilities; and to what extent our home forts and ships of war have been denuded of 4.7-inch guns for the Transvaal in consequence of the deficiency of heavy artillery in South Africa and at home in stock.

*MR. WYNDHAM: There were no guns of position as distinct from fortress guns in Cape Colony or Natal when war broke out. As regards the latter part of the question, a general statement will shortly be made on the military situation.

MOUNTAIN BATTERIES.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will state how many mountain batteries have been supplied to General Buller for his campaign in the mountain frontiers of Natal; of how many guns did these batteries consist, and were they muzzle or breechloaders; and what is the range of these guns, and are they fired with smokeless powder.

*MR. WYNDHAM: One mountain battery has been supplied to Sir Redvers Buller since he went to Natal. There are six muzzle-loading guns in each battery, which fire black powder and range about 3,000 yards.

EQUIPMENT OF THE NEWCASTLE YEOMANRY VOLUNTEERS.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN: On behalf of the hon. Member for the Gainsborough Division of Lincolnshire, I beg to ask the

Under Secretary of State for War will he explain why, after the majority of the members of the Newcastle Yeomanry Volunteers leaving this week for South Africa had supplied themselves with revolvers, an order was received that no trooper should be allowed to take this weapon to South Africa; and, did this order emanate from the War Office; and, if so, can the question be reconsidered.

MR. WYNDHAM: The Imperial Yeomanry are armed and equipped as mounted infantry, and mounted infantry do not carry revolvers. It is not considered desirable to make any change in the authorised equipment.

MILITIA REGIMENTS AND ACTIVE SERVICE.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War the number of Irish, English, and Scotch Militia Regiments which have volunteered for the front, and their respective strengths.

MR. WYNDHAM: I shall be pleased to give the information to the hon. Member, but I must ask him to give me longer notice. Such a return takes some time to compile.

MR. T. M. HEALY: How long will the hon. Gentleman take?

MR. WYNDHAM: The longer the notice the greater my gratitude. It is not that I grudge any time, but I have to make considerable demands on the time of the staff officers at the War Office. Questions put down at night can only be dealt with at about 10 o'clock the next morning; that is to say, at the very time when those officers are earnestly engaged on matters of national importance. I should like about four days' notice of questions which need investigation into facts of this character.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I shall be happy to give the hon. Member a still longer time in order to enable more English Militia regiments to volunteer.

REPORTED SHOOTING OF PRISONERS OF WAR.

MR. SHEE (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for

VOL. LXXVIII. [FOURTH SERIES].

War whether, subsequent to the Battle of Belmont, seven persons, who were made prisoners, and have been described as five Boers and two Irishmen, were shot by order of Lord Methuen; whether the order to shoot them was given by reason of their having been proved to be subjects of Her Majesty the Queen taken in arms against her forces; and whether they were tried by court-martial or otherwise; and, if so, what was the nature of the evidence adduced against them.

MR. WYNDHAM: No information has been received on this matter.

MR. SHEE: Will the Government make an inquiry?

MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member must see that it is impossible that any such event should be omitted from the reports from the front that we receive. If any evidence were brought forward of such an event taking place it would be the first thing that we should inquire into.

MAFEKING STATION-MASTER.

MR. SHEE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether James Quinlan, the station-master at Mafeking, was recently shot by order of Colonel Baden-Powell; and whether Colonel Baden-Powell has made any report of the circumstances; and, if so, of what nature.

MR. WYNDHAM: I gave the hon. Member a reply to this question yesterday.

MR. SHEE: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will look through the reports?

VICTUALLING OF THE TRANSPORTS—MEAT ON THE "AMERICAN."

GENERAL LAURIE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the fresh meat supplied for the use of the Royal Artillery and other troops taking passage on the s.s. "American," which sailed from Southampton for South Africa on the 20th January, was found unfit for issue, and was consequently condemned by the officer superintending the embarkation ; if so, what meat was supplied in its place for the use of the troops ; and whether the troops were provisioned by the War Office or under contract with the shipowners ; and, if the former, whether he would publish in the public interest the name of the contractor supplying this meat to the War Office, in order that all public departments should know of this attempt to palm off unfit meat on our soldiers, and so should be warned from any dealings with such a firm.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, N.) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether Colonel Stacpole was compelled to reject and condemn the whole of the meat supplied under contract to the "American," which embarked two batteries of artillery and other troops at Southampton on 20th January last ; who were the contractors who supplied this meat, and have they been punished with the utmost rigour of the law ; and who was responsible for allowing this meat to be shipped.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. MACARTNEY, Antrim, S.) : Arrangements were made with the owners of the "American," the West Indian and Pacific Steamship Company (Limited), to victual the troops at the rate of 1s. per head per day. A portion of the troops embarked at Southampton, and it has been reported that the fresh meat in question, on being put on board at Southampton, was at once rejected by the embarking officers at the usual inspection of provisions, on the ground that it consisted entirely of "bull" and old "cow" beef. The day being Sunday, a fresh supply could not be obtained at that port, but in accordance with telegraphic instructions, it was replaced at Queenstown (where the remainder of the troops embarked) by meat of good quality ordered by the owners' agents at their expense. The owners state that the meat was purchased from a firm who, they are informed, have supplied a large number of transports and two important trans-oceanic passenger lines. The full market price was paid for it, a guarantee having been given that it would give satisfaction. The contractors state that some of it had been served in the saloon and also to the troops before it was condemned without a word of complaint, and that after the meat was returned it was inspected by the town doctor, who certified it perfectly sound, it being afterwards disposed of to his family and hotel customers. The directors of the steamship company gave instructions that in the victualling of all transports it was to be done with unstinted liberality and regardless of cost.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.) : Was the meat home-grown or foreign ?

*MR. MACARTNEY : The contractors who supplied it are not contractors to the Admiralty, neither are they contractors to the War Office, and I have therefore no knowledge.

MR. JEFFREYS : Was there an inspection of the meat in the first instance ?

*MR. MACARTNEY : Yes, I am informed by the directors that it was inspected by their storekeeper and cook, both of whom are practical men.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick) : Cannot that gentleman find out whether it was home-grown or foreign meat ?

PROVISIONS ON THE "PAVONIA."

CAPTAIN PHILLPOTTS (Devon, Torquay) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether any complaints have been received respecting the quality of the provisions supplied to the troops that embarked for South Africa on 22nd October on board the transport "Pavonia" ; and if so, whether such complaints have been investigated, or any action taken by the Admiralty.

MR. MACARTNEY : The officer commanding the troops on the "Pavonia" has reported that the provisions were quite satisfactory.

FAREWELLS ON TRANSPORTS.

MR. WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he would take steps to make it known that ladies are not allowed to go on board the transports to see their officer relations off, even when they have so-called War Office passes.

MR. MACARTNEY: The Admiralty are of the opinion that it is extremely inconvenient to those in charge of transports, as well as undesirable in the interests of the troops, that relatives or friends should be permitted to go on board transports at the time of embarkation. The Admiralty do not issue passes for this purpose, and I shall be glad to confer with the War Office on the subject.

MR. WARNER: Will you make it publicly known?

MR. MACARTNEY: I think that this is sufficient publicity.

SPEED OF TRANSPORTS.

MR. COLVILLE (Lanarkshire, N.E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War why the quickest mail steamers flying the British flag were not employed in the transport of troops to South Africa; and whether at least two days could have been saved on the voyage over the average of the vessels which were thus employed.

MR. WYNDHAM: I understand that the First Lord of the Admiralty will be happy to answer this question on an early day next week.

TRANSPORT SERVICE RETURN.

GENERAL RUSSELL (Cheltenham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether there will be any objection to include in the return regarding the transport service to South Africa, which has already been promised, statistics regarding the number of horses, if any, carried on each ship respectively, and the number of horses lost on the voyage; and whether the ships in question were provided with the new or old pattern of fittings with or without slings for each horse.

MR. MACARTNEY: There is no objection to the inclusion of these statistics in the return.

CENSORSHIP OF OUTGOING TELEGRAMS.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN: On behalf of the hon. Member for the Gainsborough Division of Lincolnshire, I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether any censorship is exercised with regard to such outgoing telegrams from England to Africa as may be likely, directly or indirectly, to carry information to the enemy.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): Under Article 8 of the International Telegraph Convention, each Government reserves to itself the power to suspend wholly or in part the service of international telegraphs upon condition that it immediately advises each of the other Governments party to the convention. Notices have been issued under this article suspending code or cipher telegrams, and applying the censure to other telegrams from or to Zanzibar, Seychelles, Mauritius, Madagascar, British East Africa, German East Africa, Mozambique, Delagoa Bay, Rhodesia, British Central Africa, Orange Free State, Transvaal, Cape Colony and Natal. All such telegrams have to pass the censor either at Aden or at Cape Town.

THE WAR OFFICE AND NEWS FROM THE FRONT—THE TUGELA RETREAT.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War at what time was the War Office in possession of the news of the retreat of Buller's army across the Tugela, which was accomplished at 8 a.m. on Saturday morning; and, on what ground was this news held back from the general public till Sunday at 5 p.m.

MR. WYNDHAM: The message from Sir Redvers Buller was received on Sunday morning. It was a long one and took some time to decode. It was issued to the press soon after one o'clock, and placarded for general information at 2.30.

MR. MACNEILL: Was a previous message to that referred to received?

MR. WYNDHAM: There was no previous message as to having encountered a reverse, but there was one announcing that a battle was to be fought. There was no previous message giving the issue.

THE MAGERSFONTEIN ENGAGEMENT.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War when was the defeat of Lord Methuen's forces at Magersfontein, which was not communicated to the general public till the morning of Wednesday the 13th December, first known at the War Office.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The news reached the War Office early on Wednesday morning.

PUBLIC CHARGES AGAINST THE WAR OFFICE BY A VOLUNTEER OFFICER.

*MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to letters in the press, signed by the commanding officer of one of the Metropolitan Volunteer Battalions, making complaints and charges against the War Office and the military authorities; whether the authorities intend to take any notice of this serious breach of discipline by an officer on the active list; or whether it is the case that no machinery exists for dealing with cases of this kind in any other way than by depriving the offender of his commission.

REGIMENTAL OFFICERS' QUARTERS.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War on what principle does the War Office allow the wives of officers on the staff to retain quarters and allowances for six months during the absence of their husbands, while the wives of regimental officers are compelled immediately to surrender their quarters; and whether, having regard to the fact that regimental officers have smaller pay than staff officers, the privileges given to the wives of staff officers will be accorded to the wives of regimental officers.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Regimental officers are liable to be moved at the shortest notice, and are specially exempted for that reason from the payment of taxes on public quarters. The wives of regimental officers have been allowed to remain in quarters until they are actually required for the troops moving in. Staff officers have appointments for a fixed term, generally for five years, and have usually been put to expense in furnishing and fitting up quarters.

BONUSES TO MILITIA OFFICERS.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, after the embodiment of the Militia for a period of six months, the officers serving in that force are entitled to a sum of £170, and to a further sum of £50 a year after the first twelve months, whereas ex-Army officers in receipt of pensions but serving in the Militia do not receive this bonus; and whether he will take steps to see that all officers serving in the Militia are placed upon the same footing in this respect.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The question is at present under consideration.

GOVERNMENT PURCHASES IN THE METAL MARKET.

MR. WARNER: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if the War Office have discontinued the old system of buying through a broker in the metal market, and now buy by tender, so that the market is always affected by their order before they buy.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS, Birmingham, S.): Yes, the change has been made; the old system did not work so well as the new, everything being taken into account.

THE CRYING OF WAR NEWS.

MR. H. S. FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any power rests with him or with the police authorities of the Metropolis, to abate the nuisance which now pervades the streets and squares of London, day and night, Sunday and week day, from the cries of news hawkers shouting war news, to the unrest of the inhabitants, and especially of those who have relatives at the front; and if no power exists to abate the nuisance, whether he will take steps to obtain such power?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): Under the law as it at present stands it is open to the police to take proceedings in cases where the facts admit of proof of the offence or attempted offence of obtaining money by knowingly crying false news. This is a matter which it is very difficult to prove, but in some cases convictions have been obtained by the police. The London County Council have been in communication with me on the subject, and with a view to abating this nuisance, which has been brought to my notice more than once lately and to which I am fully alive, a byelaw has been framed, the terms of which I have approved, and will I understand be considered by them at their next meeting.

MR. H. S. FOSTER: Does it apply merely to the crying of false news, or does it apply to the crying in a blood-curdling voice of war news day and night?

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: The byelaw applies to the calling of newspapers so as to be a public nuisance.

DISPOSITION OF MILITIA REGIMENTS.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War how many regiments of Irish Militia have been deported from Ireland to Great Britain since the outbreak of the present war, and how many regiments of British Militia are at present serving in Ireland; why have Irish Militia regiments been removed from Ireland while British Militia regiments have been brought to Ireland to serve in their place; and on what ground are Irish Militia regiments precluded from the garrisoning of Ireland.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Seven Irish regiments have been sent to England, and fourteen English regiments to Ireland; three Irish regiments are serving in Ireland. The distribution of these battalions was decided by the War Office in consultation with the military authorities in Ireland.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: May I ask the hon. Gentleman why are not Irish regiments allowed to protect their own country with arms in their hands? Why are they sent away?

*MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Because they are rebels.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Mr. Speaker, may I ask you whether Irish rebels are good enough to fight behind in the Transvaal?

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why does not Saunderson go out with the Cavan Militia?

MILITIA FORCES SERVING IN IRELAND.

MR. SHEE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what are the numbers and composition of the Regular and Militia forces of Her Majesty at present serving in Ireland.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Owing to the constant despatch of troops to South Africa and the replacement of the Regular battalions by Militia, the disposition of the forces for home defence is necessarily in a transitional stage. I have said that I will shortly make a statement to this House describing what steps will be taken for home defence during this year, and I think the hon. Member will be able to gather from that statement the information he desires.

HARBOUR DEFENCES IN THE UNITED KINGDOM.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether most of the guns in the forts of the United Kingdom protecting important naval bases and ports are practically obsolete, and are outclassed by modern ship guns; and whether the Government will consent to the immediate appointment of a committee of men of position and experts unconnected officially with the War Office, to inquire locally into and report to Parliament upon the defences of the United Kingdom generally, and the character and adequacy of our garrison artillery in particular.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The Government does not consider the armament of our harbours satisfactory, and, as I have frequently stated to the House, a conference of three naval and military experts was appointed to go into the whole question. That conference has reported, and its recommendations are being carried out.

NEWFOUNDLAND TREATY SHORE.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether in August last the Governor of Newfoundland, speaking at Bay of Islands, informed his hearers that negotiations were going on between Great Britain and France from which he anticipated a speedy solution of the Treaty Shore problem; whether any such negotiations were then taking place; whether any solution of the questions at issue is expected before the commencement of the fishing season; whether, in the Speech from the Throne, the Governor of Newfoundland, at the close of the session of 1899, mentioned the fact that no legislation had been asked for for the continuance of previous arrangements; whether such legislation has now been asked for or offered, and in what position it stands; and whether any portion of the report of the Commission on the exercise of French Treaty rights will be laid before Parliament.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have seen a press report to the effect stated in the first part of the question, but the Governor's statement must have been misunderstood. No negotiations were then or are now proceeding with France on the Treaty Shore question. The Governor did state in his speech at the closing of the session in July last that no legislation had been asked for, but Her Majesty's Government have since requested the Colonial Government to obtain a renewal of the Treaties Act. It is not intended to lay any portion of the report at present.

THE DECLARATION OF PARIS.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was the draft of the Declaration of Paris submitted to Her Majesty the Queen, and the signature whereof was approved by Her Majesty, by a document dated the 8th April, 1856, identical in all respects with the Declaration itself as actually signed eight days later on the 16th April by Lords Clarendon and Cowley; if not, what alterations or additions were made in it between the 8th and 16th April, and were these alterations submitted to and approved by Her Majesty before the final signature; was Her Majesty's approval ever signified of the signature by Lords Clarendon and Cowley of the further agreement proposed at the Congress by Count Walewski on 16th April to the effect that the Powers which had signed the Declaration of Paris could not enter in future into any arrangement which does not rest at the same time on all the four principles, the objects of the said Declaration; and of the further agreement on the same day that the present resolution, since it cannot have a retroactive effect, cannot invalidate anterior conventions; if so, in what form, and by what document, and on what date was Her Majesty's approval signified; and whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the despatches to Lord Clarendon of 13th April, 1856, and of 18th April, 1856, relative to the Declaration of Paris; and if there be any objection, what that objection is. I beg further to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what was the form and character of the document whereby Her Majesty the Queen signified her approval to Lord Palmerston, on 8th April, 1856, of the draft of the Declaration of Paris; was the document a letter, a rescript, or a memorandum; was it authenticated by the Sign Manual; and, if not, how; and what objection, if any, is there to laying this document upon the Table of the House.

*MR. BRODRICK: It is altogether unusual and would be inconvenient to make public such details as are made the subject of inquiry by the hon. Member. The draft of the Declaration submitted to the Queen was substantially, and in its material points, identical with that eventually adopted, but it would not be in accordance with constitutional usage to lay communications between the Sovereign and her constitutional advisers on the Table of the House.

THE AFGHAN SUBSIDY.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN: On behalf of the hon. Member for the Gainsborough Division of Lincolnshire, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether any account is given by the Afghan Government of the manner in which the sum of £130,000 or thereabouts (which is annually paid to that Government) is expended, and whether an account of such expenditure can be presented to the House.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The terms of the agreement with His Highness the Ameer, dated the 12th November, 1893, presented to Parliament in 1896, do not impose any obligation upon His Highness to render any account of his expenditure of the subsidy of 18 lakhs, and no such account is given.

THE DEFENCES OF AFGHANISTAN.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN: On behalf of the hon. Member for the Gainsborough Division of Lincolnshire, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, whether, in view of the recent experience in Natal and Cape Colony proving the practical invulnerability of a well fortified range of mountains to an invading force whose base is at a great distance, the large payment to Afghanistan will be suspended and the whole or part of the money spent on strengthening the forts and increasing the armaments on the frontier.

LORD G. HAMILTON: The terms of the agreement, dated the 12th of November, 1893, would not justify any such diversion of the subsidy as the hon. Gentleman suggests.

REFORM OF IRISH PRIMARY EDUCATION.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the necessary funds have been provided for the reforms in primary education in Ireland; and whether it is the intention of the Government to enable those reforms to be carried out by providing adequate means to do so.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir M. HICKS-BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Irish Government have recommended a proposal of the Board of National Education for a large scheme of reform in the system of elementary education in Ireland, and I have been glad to find myself able to accept generally the financial portions of the scheme. The details are under discussion, and the new proposals will appear or be explained on the Estimates.

SECRET SERVICE MONEY.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has during the tenure of his office refused to accede to any application for an augmentation of the secret service money.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: No, Sir, I remember a suggestion for an increase of the vote from a department which desired an increase in the share of the vote allotted to it. But this proved to be unnecessary, as we were able to provide the sum asked for without any increase of the total vote owing to the diminished requirements of other departments.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask whether the greater portion of the secret service money is not spent in Ireland?

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: No, Sir, it is not.

MR. HEDDERWICK: Has no application been made to the right hon. Gentleman either by the Prime Minister or the Foreign Office?

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: I think if the hon. Member will look at my answer he will see that it covers the question.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Has the right hon. Gentleman settled this little difference with Lord Salisbury?

BURIAL LAW REFORM.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in during the present session the Bill, which he has stated has been prepared, to give effect to the recommendations of the Select Committee on Burial Grounds; and, if so, when will it be introduced?

SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: Yes, Sir, it is the intention of the Government to introduce such a Bill, but I cannot name a day for it.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S VISIT TO DUBLIN.

MR. DALY (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord

Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he is aware that during a recent visit of a Cabinet Minister to Trinity College, Dublin, the students of that institution attacked the Mansion House, tore down the flag, and assaulted an old woman who was the caretaker, as well as breaking the windows of tradesmen; whether any of these students were arrested or prosecuted for these offences; and if not, whether he can explain what the police were doing on the occasion.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): On the occasion referred to, some students together with a number of outsiders who were in the habit of attending lectures in the Medical School, appear to have gone out by the Lincoln Place gate of the College Park about one o'clock, and proceeded to the Mansion House, where they rang the bell, forced open a wicket leading to the garden, where the civic flag was displayed, took it down and carried it away. There was a struggle between the Mansion House servants and the students, in the course of which a woman grasped the Union Jack carried by the students and, in her efforts to tear it, was dragged to the ground and a pane of glass valued at about ten shillings was broken. There was no one to identify the persons alleged to have seized the flag and broken the window, and nothing could be done, as the whole affair occupied a few minutes only. A force of thirty constables under an inspector was despatched to the spot, but when they arrived a few minutes afterwards everything was quiet.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Arising out of the answer may I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not true that these unseemly and riotous proceedings were purely the outcome of the ill-timed and ill-advised visit of the Colonial Secretary?

CAPTAIN DONELAN: Can the right hon. Gentleman induce any of these "heroes" to volunteer for the seat of war?

RETURNS UNDER THE LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1896 (CORK).

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord

Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state down to what year returns have up to the present been made out for the Land Judge under the rules made pursuant to section 40 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1896, of estates to which that section in the first instance applies; how far the returns already presented have been gone through by the Judge to the Land Commission under the section; how many reports have been made by the Land Commission pursuant to such requests; how many estates have been offered for sale to the tenants under the section and accepted by the tenants, and what the number of such tenants is, and the total amount of the purchase money; how many estates have been actually vested in the tenants under the section, and what the number of such tenants is; and whether the offer of sale to the tenants has been refused by them in any and what cases.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Returns such as referred to have been prepared so far as they relate to cases in which receivers were appointed prior to 1891, and all the estates comprised in these returns have been dealt with by the Land Judge, with a view to their being sold under the 40th section, or of determining whether they were actually estates to which the provisions of that section are applicable. The return for the period between the years 1891 and 1896 is now almost complete. With regard to the remainder of the question, I am informed that the records of the Land Judge's Court have not been kept in such a form as would readily enable an answer to be given, and that to obtain the information an investigation which would entail much trouble and some expense would be necessary.

FAIR RENT APPLICATIONS IN COUNTY CORK.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the number of fair rent applications from the county Cork lodged with or transferred to the Land Commission and still unheard, and how long ago the first of such applications was lodged; how many of such applications lodged in or prior to the year 1898 are still unheard; how many of such applications were lodged or transferred during the year 1899; how many were disposed of by the Sub-Commission during the year 1899; and how many Lay Assistant Commissioners were assigned to the work of fixing fair rents in the county Cork during the year 1899.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: There are 715 applications to fix fair rents received from County Cork that have not yet been listed for hearing. The first of such applications was lodged in October, 1897. Of this number 48 were lodged in the latter half of the year 1897, 274 were lodged in the year 1898, and 357 in the year 1899. The remaining cases were lodged in the present year. There were 460 applications disposed of during the year 1899, when one wing of a Sub-Commission worked continuously in the county, and two other wings of the same Sub-Commission worked there for portion of the period. The cases lodged in or prior to 1898 will probably appear on the next list issued for the districts in which the holdings are situated.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Is it not a fact that the figures show that the work of the Department is falling into arrear more and more every year?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: It has certainly been falling into arrear.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING IN IRELAND—COPYRIGHTED RATE BOOKS.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether the Local Government Board have sanctioned the copyrighting of the ratepaper (Form 30), required every year by each county council in Ireland by a Dublin printing firm who issue books and forms for a Local Government Board official; and, whether they can state if the effect of this copyright has been to create a printing monopoly for one Dublin firm, and increased prices by the ratepayers for this ratepaper.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The form of ratebook prescribed by the Local Government Board has not been copyrighted, and can be obtained from any firm of printers and publishers. The Board learn that a mechanical arrangement of the ratebook, by which the rates for two half-years can be shown on one folio of the book, has been protected by a Dublin printing firm, but the Local Government Board have no official information respecting this form, nor have they expressed any opinion about it, or recommended its adoption in preference to the ratebooks brought out by any other firm. All forms prescribed by the Local Government Board's orders can be obtained by county councils, district councils, and boards of guardians, from any printers and publishers they may select, and at whatever may be the lowest market prices.

MR. FLAVIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Irish Local Government Board has recommended to certain county councils the use of this particular form?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I am not aware of that.

FAIR RENTS IN NORTH KERRY.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a large number of tenants residing in North Kerry have served originating notices to have fair rents fixed before the Sub-Land Commission at Tralee; and whether he can state about what time the Sub-Commission will sit at Tralee to hear applications from North Kerry.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I replied to a somewhat similar question yesterday. A Sub-Commission sat at Tralee in October last for the hearing of cases from the Tralee Union, and a further sitting will be arranged for by the Commissioners at as early a date as practicable.

IRISH LAND RE-VALUATION.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government intend to consider the immediate necessity of re-valuation in Ireland and take measures to have it accomplished.

MR. SHEE: I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether steps will be taken to cause a re-valuation of land in Ireland for taxation purposes in the immediate or near future; whether he has received expressions of the desirability of such re-valuation from various public bodies in Ireland; and whether judicial rents would be adopted as the rating basis of the lands in respect of which such rents have been determined.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The Government are not averse, in principle, to a re-valuation of land in Ireland, but I am not in a position to promise to deal with the matter in the present session.

IRISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT ORDERS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will arrange to continue the Return of Rules and Orders issued under the Irish Local Government Act down to date.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: There is no objection, in principle, to the preparation of the return referred to in the question, but I should like to look a little further into the matter with a view to ascertain how many rules and orders have been issued since the first return was laid, and to see whether it might not be better to defer the presentation of the continuation return until it can be presented in a fairly complete form.

IRISH TOWN TENANTS BILL.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will consider the advisability of introducing a Town Tenants Bill this session.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir, we do not propose to suggest legislation of the kind which the hon. Member indicates in his question.

[FOURTH DAY'S DEBATE.]

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Amendment [January 30th] to Question [January 30th], "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty as followeth—

Most Gracious Sovereign,

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament."—(Captain Pretyman.)

And which Amendment was—

"At the end of the Question to add the words, 'But we humbly express our regret at the want of knowledge, foresight, and judgment displayed by your Majesty's advisers alike in their conduct of South African affairs since 1895 and in their preparations for the war now proceeding.'"—(Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice.)

Debate resumed.

*SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY (continuing his speech which was interrupted at midnight the previous evening): I think the House is to be congratulated upon the higher level of patriotism to which the debate has been raised by the speeches delivered yesterday from the front benches. The right hon. Baronet opposite who last spoke did not dissociate himself from mere party attack as thoroughly as many of his admirers hoped he would have done. His theory that this vote of censure was necessary to enable hon. Members opposite to express all their blame of the Government so that afterwards they might settle down to the assistance of the Government in a national danger was a curious form of special pleading. I suppose that hon. Gentlemen opposite really think that the Government are lacking in knowledge, foresight, and judgment, but before saying so surely they could have waited until after the supplies had been voted, and until all the military necessities which are the main object and purpose of this session had been dealt with. Both sides of this House ought to be ready to join and consider what is really necessary for the Army and for the best interests of the country. The right hon. Baronet opposite said that this Amendment was not intended to bridge over the differences amongst hon. Members on the opposite side of the House. That may not have been the intention, but undoubtedly it is a most skilfully drawn Amendment, intended to reconcile such widely divergent views as those held by the right hon. Baronet himself, those of the hon. Member for Dumfries, and probably those of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin, who still sits on this side of the House. But does it reconcile those views? Is it a patriotic Amendment? What good will it do to the country, whatever may be its effect on the party opposite? If the Amendment were to succeed a General Election must follow, and I ask is this the time when any patriotic man anxious for the welfare of his country would desire to have a General Election? Is this not rather a time to close up all our party ranks, and show a united front in the face of the world and to our enemies in South Africa? Will not the chances of additional complications be enormously increased by the public exhibition of these differences amongst us? The right hon. Baronet stated that his friends and himself would support the prosecution of this war until the British flag should fly at Johannesburg and Pretoria, and until it was impossible to have a repetition of an oligarchy there and no more arsenals. That statement goes far to redeem the vacillating utterances of many of his colleagues. I would ask how many of his colleagues agree with that utterance? I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition is not in his place, because I would have humbly emphasised the challenge made by the Leader of the House that the right hon. Gentleman opposite should state what is his view upon this matter, and how far he is prepared to support the Government in carrying on this war to its ultimate and successful end. I would have invited the right hon. Gentleman for once to make up his mind and stick to it. The right hon. Gentleman in his apologia for his Amendment said --

"It would have been impossible for the Government to begin this session without a large discussion on the general points of the war."

I do not agree with that statement. On the contrary, I say it would not only have been possible, but it would have been easy and more patriotic to have begun the session by the announcement from hon. Gentlemen opposite that they held the Government seriously to blame; that they did not intend to withdraw one single iota of the blame; and after taking counsel together, they might have decided to reserve the discussion of this question until after the real business of the session had been dealt with, and until all the possible and necessary provision had been made for the carrying on of the war. Instead of this we have had the national time occupied with a discussion merely for the furtherance of party spirit. The statement that this discussion is not delaying the work of military preparation is one of extreme value, for it will relieve the feeling of anxiety in the country, and it will go far to reassure the country, which is still without the prestige of a united House of Commons. The right hon. Baronet was much exercised in his speech as to the British Constitution, and enlisted this in defence of the Government as explaining their inaction in regard to the war preparations. Supposing the Government had made the serious war preparations which some hon. Gentlemen opposite think ought to have been made in advance, and supposing there had been no war, what would hon. Gentlemen opposite have done then? Why, they would have gone to the country denouncing the Government for its want of foresight, for its extravagance in spending the money, and for unnecessarily burdening the ratepayers with the cost of the war. All these are possibilities under the British Constitution, and are necessarily involved in our system of Government—a fact which is obvious to everybody in this House. My hon. friend the Member for South Shields, whose brilliant speech is within the memory of this House, has stated that he will vote for the Amendment because he believes that this war was inevitable and just, but the Government did not make adequate preparations for it. But if this Amendment goes to a division I shall vote against it on precisely the same grounds as my hon. friend the Member for South Shields will vote for it, namely that the war was unavoidable, and that the Government made all the military preparations which they were advised were necessary, or could have made without the sanction of the House. I believe it would be greatly to the interests of our party and the Government if this Amendment went to a division, because it would show that the Government still possess the confidence of the vast majority of this House, and really reflects the opinion of the great majority of the people of this country upon this most important national question. But, Sir, it is better that this division should not be taken, and that we should be united on this question before the world. I would remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that in 1878 Mr. Gladstone, as leader of the Liberal party, then in opposition, requested one of his associates to move a vote of censure on the Government of the day. A vote of censure was put down on the Paper, but after news had been received of a strategic movement of Russian troops, which was not accompanied by a single blow, Mr. Gladstone considered that the duty of the Opposition was to avoid embarrassing or appearing to embarrass the Government, and he requested his colleague to withdraw the motion. Is the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition less patriotic than Mr. Gladstone, or is it that he is less influential with his followers? Be that as it may, I would appeal to him on the broadest grounds of patriotism that his duty in this instance is to pursue the course pursued by Mr. Gladstone in 1878. We are still fighting under circumstances of extreme discouragement in South Africa; nay, we are fighting for our very Empire, and I do not class as real patriots those who endeavour to make party capital out of such a state of things. I believe that when the full significance of the present debate is known to the country many who are ordinarily ardent supporters of the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues will dissociate themselves from the course which has been taken. We are now in a moment of emergency, and what is required is to make provision for our immediate and urgent needs. All this time South Africa waits, and we have no alternative but to fight out this war to the end, and the end was indicated in the speech, to which I desire to pay a tribute of admiration, of the hon. Baronet the Member for the Berwick Division. The end must be reached, but before it is reached there may be further reverses. Let us be prepared for them. The determination of our people will be the same—a determination that our colonies shall be protected, and our position in South Africa secured for all time, that the federation of our colonies shall be completed, and that the anxieties now pressing upon us shall be removed.

Sir Fortescue Flannery.

Under these circumstances it is the duty of this House to put aside party spirit, and to patriotically think only of what is best for our country in the hour of her need.

*MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, like several others who have spoken on the opposite side of the House, has endeavoured to represent this discussion as one which might have been avoided, and one which was not patriotic. Sir, this discussion was absolutely unavoidable. All the precedents are in its favour. There has never been a similar position in which the Opposition did not at the very first moment arraign the policy of the Government, and require it to account for the position into which it had brought the country. I will not, however, repeat what was said yesterday by the hon. Baronet the Member for the Berwick Division in his very impressive speech, to which we all listened with so much interest. He showed by irrefutable arguments that a discussion of this kind is necessary and that it hastens instead of delays the real business of the session. Everybody in this country is asking why we are at war. We have had a great many inconsistent and a great many unsatisfactory explanations. The very persons who complain of us raising the question in the House of Commons are the very persons who lose no opportunity of telling us that the war is just and was inevitable. Even from the judicial bench we hear fulminations most unworthy of the traditions of that bench. I believe the country and this House desires to know what are the causes which have brought us into our present position, and I think those of us who represent the country—as we all hope we do in our several ways—would be entirely unworthy of a seat in this House if we did not take the very first opportunity of bringing this matter to the great inquest of the nation. There is also another reason which requires it. When we come to consider the settlement to be made after the war, it will be necessary to have understood and weighed the causes which have produced the war, and the sooner the country forms its judgment as to those causes the better it will be. The Opposition are accused of endeavouring to make party capital out of this matter. That charge is always made, and will, I hope, always be disregarded. Can anyone think that it is an agreeable task for us to say in this House what we believe it is our duty—certainly a most unwelcome duty—to say? Is it pleasant to have to tell the country that it is engaged in a war and is making enormous sacrifices that might have been avoided? Nothing but a sense of duty would induce us to undertake so painful a task, and I am glad to be able to add, after the frank admission of the Under Secretary of State for War—an admission which I expected from his fairness—that this discussion does not delay the executive action the Government has to take, and therefore it cannot be suggested that it in any way interferes with the interests of the country. Let me ask the House to consider what was the South African problem as it stood immediately after the raid. What should have been in the beginning of 1896 the aim of a wise, far-seeing and statesmanlike policy in South Africa? Surely it should have been to promote concord and the fusion of the races, to keep the peace, to soften down old animosities and to endeavour to get Englishmen and Dutchmen to live together as friends and to co-operate for the good of their common country. Peace would have produced fusion, and in that fusion the English element would ultimately have prevailed. There was a time, no doubt, when it might have been suggested that the Dutch element was likely to prevail. It is deeply rooted in the soil and increases with surprising rapidity. I do not know whether the House is aware that the number of Dutch in South Africa is now ten times greater than it was when we took over the country in 1806. But the tide turned in 1885. That year marked the discovery of the Rand gold fields, which increased to a surprising degree the immigration of British subjects into South Africa. From that time onwards it was plain that the British element would grow more rapidly than the Dutch, and that therefore its preponderance was assured, at any rate for some generations. The fusion of which I have spoken was proceeding up to the raid of December 1895, which interfered with and destroyed the process of conciliation, assimilation, and amalgamation which was going on. It threw matters suddenly back in South Africa, and certainly not least in Cape Colony. It gave the Transvaal a justification for the armaments which immediately followed, the expenditure on which leaped into much higher figures than in previous years, it threw the Orange Free State into the arms of the Transvaal just as did our war with the Transvaal in 1881, and it undid the work of years in Cape Colony. Everyone who knows Cape Colony will tell you that the progress of friendly fusion had been most satisfactory up to the raid. But the raid, deplorable and culpable as it was, did not change what ought to have been the aim and purpose of our policy. It only made the need for pacific methods greater and the necessity for patience greater. As detached extracts from particular passages in a book written by me on the subject have been read in this House, perhaps I may be permitted to quote a few words which I used in 1897 to sum up what British policy in South Africa ought to be. I said it ought to avoid even the least appearance of aggression, and that what was wanted in South Africa was tact, calmness, and patience—above all things, patience. I suppose I shall be told that the Uitlanders suffered grievances in the Transvaal, and that it was necessary to remove them. Sir, there were grievances in the Transvaal—I have never denied it—but they were grossly exaggerated. They were grievances which might have been removed by steady and quiet pressure instead of by language which brought this country into a position from which it was hard to withdraw without humiliation. There are two observations I would like to make in regard to these grievances. The first is, that they have been immensely exaggerated. I do not at all deny that there was a bad Government in the Transvaal; but it was a Government whose badness did not affect men in their lives or their property. Property was perfectly safe. I say that without the slightest fear of contradiction; and whatever may be alleged to the contrary, the law courts rendered impartial justice between man and man. Life was safe, and the best proof of that is that the only case cited of insecurity is the case of Edgar. I do not know whether that case is fresh in the memory of the House, and I will not enter into details further than to say that the man whom Edgar struck down was an Englishman; that the policeman who shot Edgar when the latter was resisting the attempt to arrest him was a man named Jones ; and that the man whom Edgar struck ultimately died in the hospital from the effects of the blow. I do not argue this case further than to say that it is one in which it was quite possible, as the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries stated the other day, for a jury to arrive at the conclusion to which that jury arrived, and that there is not the slightest reason to think that any race feeling had anything to do with the matter. At any rate, it was the only case cited as to insecurity of life in the Transvaal. When you consider what a mining city is, and what is the insecurity of life and property, and the difficulty of seizing offenders in the mining cities of America, for instance, the wonder is that there was not more crime in Johannesburg. Let me put another point. The Rand was very prosperous. Do hon. Members realise how the mining industry there was advancing by leaps and bounds ? During that period the number of stamp batteries had immensely increased. The dividends paid by the gold mines rose from £794,000 in 1892 to £4,847,000 in 1898. The output of gold, which in 1896 was £7,864,000, increased in two years, that is from 1896 to 1898, to £15,141,000. It cannot, therefore, be said that the gold industry was not thriving. Then, as to the condition of the white workingmen ; their average wage increased from £24 per month in 1896 to £26 per month in 1898. The country was one of the best for workingmen which they could find anywhere in the world. Under these circumstances it is perfectly clear that the grievances, whatever they were, did not seriously interfere with the prosperity of the gold mining industry. I was in Johannesburg the year before the raid, and I must say I never saw a town in which the people seemed to be enjoying themselves more completely to their hearts' content. Therefore, although I do not for a moment deny that there were serious grievances, and that they deserved the attention of the Government, I repeat that they were grossly exaggerated, and not such as obviously required a war to redress them. Furthermore, I hold that they were evils which would have righted themselves. They had nearly done so before the raid. The right hon. the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs himself told us the other night that before the raid the Reform party had very nearly attained victory in the presidential election, and that it was growing in strength every day ; and there is no doubt that but for the raid it would have ultimately succeeded. The raid stopped that, but even after the raid confidence would have been restored, had it not been for the campaign against the Transvaal Government carried on in England, and the fear and suspicion created thereby in the Boer mind, which prevented the process of reform being resumed. Immigration was continuing in spite of these terrible grievances. The average number of white workmen at work in 1896 was 7,430, but it had risen in 1898 to 9,476. The condition of the white population was therefore improving, wages were rising, and it was perfectly clear that the proportion of Englishmen to the Dutch would have gone on increasing, and the difficulty of maintaining the Krugerite system would have been constantly greater. The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs admitted that when he said that the Krugerite Government, like other defective Governments, carried the seeds of its own dissolution. What conclusions are we to draw from these facts ? This conclusion above all, that it would have been far better if our Government had waited a little longer before they began their policy of pressing with urgency and menace for the redress of the Uitlander grievances. I have said that the grievances were bad ; but, Sir, war is worse. Everything in politics is comparative, and the redress of these grievances affecting a comparatively small number of persons who had gone into the country with notice that the grievances existed, was a very small matter compared with the disastrous war into which we have been drawn. I venture to believe that if the Government had foreseen that war would follow, and what the war would bring forth, they would never have ventured on that line of policy. Though they could scarcely foresee all the calamities that have followed, they ought to have foreseen that their policy was a dangerous one, likely to end in war. The Transvaal was armed, and the possession of arms acts upon the temper of men who have them, and makes them more likely to have resort to the use of these arms. The Transvaal was suspicious, and attributed everything that was done by the British Government to the influence of the men concerned in the raid. I do not enter into the question whether the Transvaal suspicions were justified or not, but I ask the House to realise what was the cardinal fact of the situation—viz., that the British Government and country were identified in the minds of the Transvaal Boers with the raid. Everybody knows what were the facts on which their suspicions were based; but without stating those facts I am content to point out that these suspicions were known to exist, were known to govern their views, and ought to have shewn Her Majesty's Government what distrust they must expect. Does anyone then think that if a year ago, when the House met in February last, we would have consented to press for the redress of the grievances of the Uitlanders if it had been foreseen that the price of such a policy was the present war, with all its calamities? Let me give an illustration of the state of opinion less than a year ago. A debate on the Transvaal was raised on the 20th March, by the hon. Member for the Ecclesall Division of Sheffield. He stated in strong terms the grievances of the Uitlanders, and complained that the Colonial Office had not taken steps to redress these grievances. The Colonial Secretary made what appeared to me to be a very pacific and reassuring speech. I remember that the hon. Member for Poplar, and myself, rose and expressed our satisfaction at the pacific language the Colonial Secretary used, and said that we were very glad the Government realised the danger of rousing the suspicions of the Boers and of intensifying racial antagonisms all over South Africa. What was more significant still was that not a single Member of the House then rose in support of the hon. Member for the Ecclesall Division of Sheffield, whose attack was treated with silent contempt. If these grievances were then so terrible, and called for such instant interference, why was there not a little more feeling in the House shown in order to stir up the Colonial Office to action? I maintain that the better course for the Government would have been to exercise a little more patience until the memories of the raid had ceased to be so fresh, and a more favourable moment for intervention arrived. The Government, however, shortly after 20th March, changed their policy, and why they did so I have never been able to discover. But supposing that they felt it necessary to press for a removal of the grievances, how should they have gone about the task? The one essential thing was that they should have carried with them, as far as possible, the sentiment of the Cape Dutch and the Orange Free State. Hon. Members may think that that was a hopeless enterprise; but that was not so, because in the previous disputes which had arisen with the Transvaal Government, we had the sympathy of the Cape Dutch and the Orange Free State. Every one remembers the Drifts question. It was a matter of common knowledge that the Orange Free State and the Cape Dutch complained bitterly of the conduct of the Transvaal at that time, and the Cape Dutch at any rate, as we know from the attitude of the Cape Ministry, would have supported the British Government if war had arisen upon it. It was the bounden duty, therefore, of the Government when they took up this question of the Uitlanders' grievances to avoid anything like aggression, or do anything that might seem to threaten the independence of the Transvaal, for that is a point on which the Dutch in the Orange Free State and in Cape Colony are extremely sensitive. However, the Government went on disregarding these considerations. And here I would like to submit two propositions which I trust we shall agree in holding ought to govern a great country like ours in negotiations. The first is, that small States have the same rights as great States, and that we should observe our treaties with a small State just as scrupulously as we observe them with the great and powerful States.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): And they with us.

*MR. BRYCE: And they with us. My second proposition is that every State, not only before it goes to war, but before it threatens war, should have a proper case for war. It should be able to make out what is called a casus belli before it begins even to threaten a resort to force. That is agreed; but if that is agreed, that is the proposition which we have disregarded. There are two lines on which the Government might have proceeded. They might have asked for a redress of the grievances. If the Transvaal Government in an arrogant manner refused to redress them, they might have furnished a casus belli. I do not say they would have furnished it, for the negotiations never got that length, but for the sake of argument we may concede that it is possible they might have done so, had the Transvaal refused all redress. But the question never came up, and we never dealt with it. Instead of going upon the grievances, we elected to make our complaint upon the question of the franchise. Now the Government could not use with regard to the franchise question any argument except that of persuasion. They were not entitled to use any threats, because that question did not contain any casus belli. It has been assumed all through these discussions that we are entitled to go to war to secure franchise rights for British Uitlanders. We had no such rights whatever. This point is of so much importance that I may quote some facts to establish it. First of all there was no provision ever made in either of the Conventions for granting political rights. The first occasion when the Transvaal raised their franchise was in 1882. It had been based on a one year's residence, and they raised the term to three years. In 1884 we made another Convention with them, and if we objected to their raising the franchise, then was the time to object. But by making a new Convention in 1884 we waived any right of objection to their raising the term which we might have possessed. When they raised the franchise still further in 1890 we again made no protest. They then raised it to fourteen or fifteen years. That was the time to protest if we thought they had not the right to do it, but we did not do so.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): May I ask what Government was in power at the time?

MR. BRYCE: In 1890 a Conservative Ministry was in power. Both parties in the House have all along taken the same view of the legal operation of the two Conventions in this respect. In 1896 Mr. Chamberlain said—

"Since the Convention of 1884 Her Majesty's Government have recognised the South African Republic as a free and independent Government as regards all its internal affairs not touched by the Convention."

Again in March of the same year the right hon. Gentleman telegraphed—

"Her Majesty's Government do not claim any right under the Convention to prescribe

the particular internal reforms which should be made in the South African Republic."

There was no mention made of the so-called suzerainty from 1884 until it was raised by the Colonial Secretary in 1897. With regard to that I must say that the introduction of the word suzerainty has been the most unhappy introduction of an unnecessary and pernicious theme into the negotiations that could well be imagined. It was superfluous so far as we were concerned, because it could not mean anything more than the right of vetoing treaties which we undoubtedly had under the Convention of 1884, but it made the Boer Government believe that under the cover of this vague word suzerainty we were endeavouring to set up a right of interference in their internal affairs. This belief was strengthened by the conduct and words of the South African League agitators at Johannesburg, who were perpetually calling upon Britain to intervene "as the suzerain power." But our suzerainty, if it existed (which it did not), meant nothing more than the right to veto treaties, and gave no title to interfere with the franchise law or any other internal affair. All the demands that were made for the extension of the franchise were based upon no right whatever of this country, and could only be supported by arguments of persuasion and remonstrance, and not by threats of war. The language of the Government was however the language of constant and increasing menace, and it was accompanied by the sending out of troops at a time when negotiations were in progress on a question which furnished no casus belli. Seldom have negotiations which ought to have kept a conciliatory tone been conducted with less prudence or less regard to legal right. It has already been remarked that there were several despatches which were most unfortunate to publish, one of which was that from the High Commissioner of the 5th of May. Another one hardly less unfortunate was that sent by the High Commissioner on the 31st of August last year. It is the one known as the "hurry up" despatch, in which the British Government is urged to press the Transvaal harder and be quicker about it, and may be found at p. 51 of C-9521. The High Commissioner says:

"British South Africa is prepared for extreme measures, and is ready to suffer much in order to see the vindication of British authority."

Under what circumstances was that written? That was written when the only matter in dispute was the franchise, and the use of those words "British authority" was totally unjustifiable, because Britain had no authority whatever in the matter of the franchise, a purely internal affair. The High Commissioner had himself admitted previously that the franchise was a purely internal question and his words on August 31st show how completely he had forgotten the legal rights of the case. The First Lord of the Treasury had said the Government ought to conduct these negotiations without any unnecessary menace, but their language has been the language of menace all the way through. The Highbury speech was a speech full of menace, and that speech was made on the 26th of August, after the Boers had sent a despatch on the 19th of August agreeing to the five years franchise: it was made at a time when a far more favourable offer than had ever been made before by the Boers was in the hands of the Government. Mr. Greene at Pretoria on the 30th August used that speech to frighten the Boers. This threatening language was accompanied by the sending out of troops, which there was no justification for, having regard to the facts that the negotiations were confined to the franchise. My right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition was therefore entirely justified when he said that so long as the question under discussion was the question of the franchise there was no justification for threats of war nor for that most serious form of threat which consists in ostentatious preparation for war. After September 8th, and finally after September 22nd, the franchise question was dropped. The Government then said that they must put forward demands which might furnish a casus belli, and perceived also that they were getting within a measurable distance of war, while still imperfectly prepared for it. They said in the telegram of the 8th September that Her Majesty's Government reserved their right to consider their position de novo and to formulate new proposals, obviously of a far-reaching kind; and they said that they would communicate their views in a further despatch. It is worth remembering that the fresh proposals which the Government said they would formulate never went to the Boers before they declared war on October 9th. What was being done in the interval? Her Majesty's Government was preparing for war. [AN HON. MEMBER: So were the Boers.] Certainly they were, and after the language of Mr. Conyngham Greene and of the Highbury speech could they do anything else but prepare for war? The trouble was that the Government prepared for war too late. They did not send out enough troops to put the colonies in a proper state of defence, because, I believe, they thought all along that the Boers would yield. The Government were persuaded that they had only to threaten sufficiently in order to make the Boers give way. The Under Secretary for War, in a speech which was listened to not only with pleasure but with admiration, and on which, if I had been in the House, I should have been glad to offer him my congratulations, has said that the Government were not able to send out troops sooner or to make larger preparations because they did not want to spoil their diplomacy. Then, if they did not want to spoil their diplomacy by their preparations, why did they not reduce their diplomacy to the level of their preparations? These two things ought to go hand in hand, but, so far from this being the case, it would appear as if the diplomacy had been warlike and the preparations peaceful. They steered the ship into the storm while the barometer was falling, and before the ship was made ready to meet it. They have so mismanaged the whole matter as to give our antagonists both a legal and a material advantage, a legal advantage, because we have never shown a casus belli, a material advantage, because we gave them the benefit of those precious first days and weeks of the campaign which have so greatly affected its whole subsequent course. When people asked what was the reason for this war, the most common answer given was that we were fighting for equal rights, to put down an oppressive oligarchy. But we have no right to put it down. We have no rights against the Transvaal except what the Convention of 1884 gave us. Oligarchy or not, that is a matter for its own laws; and we have no more legal justification for complaining of an oligarchy in the Transvaal than we have of a despotism in Russia. When I am told that the Transvaal is an oligarchy, I would remind the House that it is an oligarchy which rests on universal suffrage—the universal suffrage of its own citizens, who are the people who took the country and made the country, and are the permanent inhabitants of the country, as opposed to the Uitlanders who come and go—except the mines—the mines are not the whole of the country. I wish they had given the franchise; but can we call that country an oligarchy in which its citizens, down to the age of thirteen, rally to its support when it is attacked? If so all the democracies of the ancient world were oligarchies. Others assign another cause, and say that we are trying to remove the grievances of the Uitlanders. But this, too, we cannot rightfully allege. We never made the grievances of the Uitlanders a cause for war, because we never formulated our demands for redress, and do not know but what redress would have been granted had we persisted in those demands. These are not merely technical considerations. They have made all the difference to the attitude of the Orange Free State, and a great difference to the Cape Dutch. It is because we deserted legal right and have appeared as aggressors that we have the Free State against us, and have alienated the Cape Dutch. We have also incurred the censure of foreign countries by the same disregard of legal rights. I do not speak merely of the foreign press, which has often shown its jealousy and bitterness. I speak of enlightened and moderate opinion abroad which has often been with England. There are many people in foreign countries to-day who are passing a severe censure upon Great Britain, and who never censured us before. I had a letter the other day from a distinguished German politician, and the editor of a powerful German paper, and he said, "I have always been the friend and defender of England, but now we find your conduct in this matter absolutely indefensible." And I think there has never been a time in which the general condemnation of the country has been so widespread. We have considerable cause for disquiet when we regard the possibly unfriendly action of several of the Continental Powers and couple that with the almost universal disapprobation of the peoples of Europe. I repeat, therefore, that it is a great error to appear before the world with a weak legal case. A third cause for the war is assigned by those who feel the weakness of the reasons already mentioned. We are told that the Boers challenged British supremacy. Their armaments were not a challenge to British supremacy, for the First Lord of the Treasury has admitted that their armaments were justified by the raid. ["No, no."] Yes, for the First Lord has said that the raid prevented Ministers from complaining of those armaments. It might be said that their armaments were in excess of what would be needed to suppress a rising. That is perfectly true, but the next attack they expected was not one from their Uitlander subjects, but from this country, because they believed that the men who had made the raid had got the ear of the Government of this country. It is also said, by those who feel that some sort of humanitarian palliation for the war is needed, that the war was made for the sake of the natives, but those who know how the natives have been treated by the whites in every part of South Africa will feel that our hands are not clean, though it is quite true that the Boers have treated the natives much worse than we have done. In this native question, considering what has been done to the natives in British territories, no just cause for war can be found. Then we have the argument of the conspiracy to drive us out of South Africa, but that is not the cause which brought about the war. It was an afterthought to explain, to excuse the war. If there was the conspiracy, and if it was the cause of the war, why did the Government not know of it? It has not been proved to exist, and indeed all the probabilities are the other way. Now, does the House know what the probabilities are? Was this conspiracy hatched in the Transvaal? It is quite true they wanted to expand. Why? In the north and west it was for the sake of getting more land. As their population increased it was necessary to have that expansion. They wanted it for the sake of their stock and for fresh pasturage. They did not want to expand towards the two colonies, because there the land was already all taken up. There exists much misapprehension, regarding the parties in the Transvaal and their respective aspirations. The party which was led by President Kruger was a party which wanted independence for the Transvaal if they could get it, and they wanted expansion over unoccupied lands to the north, but had no plan for absorbing the British colonies. If that plan existed—I believe it was only the dream of a few—it was not the policy of President Kruger; it was the policy of his opponents. It was the Young Afrikaner party, some of whom no doubt had the idea that at some time or other there might be a Dutch Republic embracing Cape Colony. But that was not Kruger's policy at all; it was opposed to his policy; it may have been Joubert's policy, it was not Kruger's. So far I have dealt with the Transvaal; now let me come to the Free State. The Free State had lived in perfect peace with us. The Free State was a country in which Englishmen and Dutchmen were on an equal footing. For many years the President of the Volksraad of the Free State was a Scotsman, and when the President of the Free State resigned his office in 1895, this Scotsman became a candidate with Mr. Steyn for the Presidency. I was told when I was there in November 1895, that the chances of the two were about equal, and that it was extremely likely that the Scotsman, who had been a British subject and British in all his feelings, would become President. That he did not do so was due to the raid, which of course roused Dutch feeling. There was not the slightest reason to apprehend any share on the part of the Free State in any Dutch conspiracy against Britain, or any sympathy with such conspiracy. Least of all was there any reason for such apprehension with regard to the Cape Dutch. Surely their loyalty has been sufficiently proved. We all remember the despatch in which Sir Alfred Milner spoke of them in 1897, and the exuberant testimonies he bore to their loyalty. We all remember the grant of £30,000 a year for a contribution to the British Navy, and we all remember the eloquent words in which the First Lord of the Admiralty expressed his sense and the sense of the Government of the conduct of the Cape Dutch on that occasion. There was a Dutch majority in the Cape Parliament, and that Dutch majority passed this vote unanimously. I do not think we want any better proof of Cape loyalty than that. I should like to say one word with regard to Mr. Hofmeyer. If there was anybody in whom the Bond policy was personified it was Mr. Hofmeyer. He enjoyed an unexampled influence over the Dutch people. What has Mr. Hofmeyer done? He was known to many of us fifteen years ago as the author of one of the schemes of Imperial Federation, the United Tariff scheme, under which all the British colonies and the mother country were to unite on a joint tariff, in which there was to be a preference given to each colony and the mother country as members one of another. I do not think you want better proof than that of the loyalty of Mr. Hofmeyer to the British Empire. Within the last few months he has done everything a man could to prevent a Dutch insurrection at the Cape in aid of the two Republics. I might add that notwithstanding the terrible temptations and solicitations to which the Cape Dutch have been exposed during the last three or four months, when many of them have brothers or sons-in-law or other near relatives in the hostile armies, very few have risen against us. If there had been this conspiracy surely it would have been shown by a much more general rising. With the conspiracy, which I hope we may take to be disproved, there goes the theory that this war was inevitable." Wars have often been called inevitable which were in fact avoidable and have been avoided. How many times during the last forty years have we been told that a struggle was approaching with some European Power, but wise diplomacy has averted the danger? Nor can it be said that this conflict was inevitable when there were several points in the course of the negotiations when a conciliatory dispatch, or a frank acceptance of the large concessions which the Boers made, would have removed all danger of war. The only thing inevitable about the matter was that such diplomacy as the Government followed was certain to lead to war, unless the Boers were prepared to yield everything. In that sense the war was inevitable. Still, I do not believe that the Government intended war; my opinion is that they went on thinking the Boers would yield. I believe that they went on, even in the month of September, with the idea that their preparations would have the effect of inducing the Boers to yield. Our complaint against them is that this was a dangerous game to play, a game which should not have been played unless your preparations were in such a state that you could take action immediately on the declaration of war. Now we are told that it is destiny which is answerable for these catastrophes—catastrophes which appear to many among us to be the natural results of the total want of knowledge and of foresight which the Government displayed. Destiny is an explanation which seems to be better fitted for the vizier of an Eastern potentate than for the Minister of a civilised country. The First Lord of the Treasury, if I understand him rightly, carries his theory of destiny even further.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not said anything about destiny.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes.

*MR. BRYCE: Very well; that is destiny. The right hon. Gentleman carries this theory still further. He says that not only was the war inevitable, but the ignorance of the Government was inevitable, and if the ignorance of the Government was inevitable the want of preparation was inevitable. I will carry the chain of fate one step further. Not only was the war inevitable, not only was the ignorance of the Government inevitable, and not only was the unpreparedness inevitable, but the indignation of the country is inevitable, and a vote of censure such as this is the only course which can be followed when such diplomacy has been pursued and such deplorable results have followed. The right hon. Gentleman and the Prime Minister find fate and the British constitution sufficient to explain all our misfortunes. As regards the British constitution I will say just one thing. There was a Roman maxim, worthy of Imperial Rome, and worthy to be remembered by Imperial England, that Empire is preserved by the same arts by which it has been acquired. If the British constitution was good enough to enable us to build up the gigantic Empire over which the Queen reigns, surely it is good enough to maintain that Empire. I have said nothing in these remarks about the morality of this war, nor about its justice. I have not touched upon those topics because I desired to keep the discussion on the ground of British interest alone, to look upon it simply as to what the true interest of this country is, and to show how gravely those interests have suffered. We are very often told that it is a question between Imperialists on the one hand and what are called "Little Englanders" on the other. My complaint against the Government is that they have struck a great and heavy blow at our Imperial interests. So far from complaining from the point of view of the man who does not value the connection of this country with her colonies and the possession of our transmarine dominions, I accuse the Government from the point of view of one who does value that connection. Our hold upon our self-governing colonies has rested for these many years past upon friendship and attachment. It is because we have given them self-government, and because we have endeavoured to keep them cordially attached to ourselves, and to make them value the Imperial connection, that we have been strong in their support. But I fear that at present we have destroyed those feelings—[Cries of dissent.] Hon. Gentlemen should let me finish my sentence—I fear that we have at present destroyed those feelings in the bulk of the population in South Africa. That is a serious matter. It is a serious matter to alienate the majority of the population of a great colony which is important not only from its wealth, its population, but also from its strategic position. In most wars we have at any rate this consolation, that although we may be hard pressed for the moment, we can look forward to and contemplate, after the war is ended, a better state of things for which sacrifices will have been made not in vain. But here, I am sorry to say, I see difficulties at the end of this war quite as great as the difficulties which surrounded us at the beginning. The clouds which hang about us now are dark enough, but the clouds which will hang about South Africa when the war has come to an end will be quite as dark and quite as hard to dispel. But, Sir, we must go on. It is one of the curses of the position into which we have got that we cannot stop. We must not only clear the two colonies of the hostile forces which now hold them, but we must also restore our military reputation and position; we must make our strength manifest to the world, we must set our military strength upon a proper footing, and we must also see to it, I think, that at the close of this war there is no state of things left out of which similar troubles can again arise. On this subject there is little, if any, difference of opinion in this House, at any rate among English and Scottish Members. I yield to no one either in admiration of the spirit which has been shown all over the country, or in recognition of what has been done by our colonies, and I venture to think that in expressing that sense of the way in which the country has shown its patriotic constancy and energy at the present crisis I am expressing the feelings of all the Liberal Members in this House. The feeling which the country has expressed will be shown in this House by our unanimously voting the supplies which the Government think necessary for the occasion. But when the time comes for a settlement at the end of the war we must show a change of spirit in our policy. In endeavouring to settle the affairs of South Africa in the future we must show more wisdom, more judgment, more foresight than the Government has shown in the past. It is not merely our material strength; it is not merely our wealth and the unrivalled magnitude of our Navy that have given us our great position in the world and have extended our Empire, it has been the respect we have generally inspired for our sense of justice and for our respect for the rights of other nations. I do not say that even Britain has not sometimes been wanting in that feeling, but I venture to claim that on the whole her foreign and colonial policy shows that she has not only a love of freedom, but also a respect for the rights of other communities. It is by showing that respect and by the wise principles of the policy we have followed towards our colonies that we have attained our present strength and greatness. Latterly things have changed. ["No."] I am afraid they have. I am afraid that latterly we have begun to indulge in a haughty, changed spirit, and in a spirit which has sometimes not been regardful of the rights of other States, and of late years we have sometimes given cause to other countries to question our regard for international rights and the purity of our motives. I believe that in a return to those better traditions by which the British Empire has been won lies the best hope of recovering, so far as we can, the trust and the confidence of the Dutch in South Africa, and of establishing our dominion there as well as elsewhere upon the best and surest of foundations—the affection of our fellow subjects.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am sincerely anxious in this debate to be able to draw from all the speeches that are made on the other side of the House, all that support of our policy which we can find in any portions of it. I do not wish to carry party warfare into the debate. I do not wish to indulge in any recriminations, and as I listen to the speeches which are made I ask myself how much do they contain which may possibly support us in our policy in South Africa. We are told that this Amendment is unavoidable—destiny, I suppose, according to the right hon. Gentleman, has forced it upon the Opposition. I do not in any degree wish to wound the right hon. Gentleman's susceptibilities in regard to a portion of his speech, but I cannot help saying as I heard the long historical, technical, and legal portion of his arguments in trying to prove that this country in this matter is in the wrong— [Cries of "No, no!" and "The Government!"] No. We are at present the servants of the country. We are at present engaged in carrying out that task which he himself says is to be carried on to the end, and I wish to know whether he, and those who sit by him on that bench, think that the country, if they read his speech, and if they believe in his arguments, will be more enthusiastic in support of us than they are now? Does he not think it is calculated to cool the ardour of the people if they are told that this is an unjust war? The right hon. Gentleman said he had not declared this to be an unjust war. When I come to a further portion of the observations which I have to make I shall have to point out that he did contend it is an unjust war. But the people know that it is not an unjust war. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] The country knows it. The right hon. Gentleman towards the end of his speech felt it his bounden duty to say he had not said it was an unjust war. How many hon. Members opposite say that it is?

MR. BRYCE: I never used the word "unjust" either one way or the other.

Fourth Day.

MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman forgets; he used the word "unjust." He said it was an immoral and unjust war.

MR. BRYCE: I said I should not enter into the question of morality or of justice, because I was arguing the question on the basis of British interests.

MR. GOSCHEN: Unfortunately he had entered on the question of the justice and morality of the war. But if he wishes to have an answer to that portion of his speech there are some right hon. Gentlemen very close to him, and there are other hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite who have said that this was an inevitable war, and I refer him to them for a reply to some of the arguments which he used. Well, he has utilised this Amendment for the purpose of proving that the country is in the wrong, an effort which I thought it was not worth his while to make. Other right hon. Gentlemen have given us different explanations of the reasons for the moving of this Amendment. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean said that it was moved in order to bring home to the Government their responsibilities. The hon. Baronet the Member for the Berwick Division of Northumberland, in the extremely able speech he made last night, said the Amendment was moved with three objects, and they were to criticise some of the speeches that had been made, to enunciate opinions upon the matter, and to give the Government an opportunity of redeeming their reputation. The other night it seemed clear that some right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite were going to utilise this debate in order to do something which they believe it is their duty to do, and that is to hold us up to obloquy and opprobrium, while others wish through it to chastise us for our imprudence. I think it is seldom that a vote of censure has been justified on such extraordinary grounds. I welcome the speech of the hon. Gentlemen the Member for the Berwick Division of Northumberland, not because of the criticisms, which we thought unfair, he made upon individual members of the Government, but because I value the declaration of policy which he made, and which exactly expresses the views of Her Majesty's Government. In the first instance he stated that the primary object of what had happened was not the planting of the British flag at Pretoria; that was not the original conception before the war began, but since the war began he has declared in the strongest manner two principles which he upholds. One principle is the principle that there shall never again be an arsenal which shall be able to threaten that which must be the superior Power in South Africa, and on the other hand he has said there must be perfect equality between all white men. In those objects I entirely concur and to those objects we shall devote every energy in our power, and we shall look to the country to continue to support us until those objects are gained. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean said he wished to bring home to the Government their responsibilities. In reference to the responsibility of the Cabinet, I think I might leave the matter where it was left in that admirable speech of the Under Secretary for War, which exhausted the whole subject so completely and so ably that we would be perfectly ready to take a division and to look upon the speech as a vindication of our position. The right hon. Gentleman says he wishes to know where the responsibility lies. The responsibility lies with the Cabinet. I do not understand why he questions it. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to suggest that Members of the Government had tried to shelter themselves behind their military advisers. In no sense have they done that. In no case do we wish to do it. How does it happen that it is sometimes said that we shelter ourselves behind our military advisers? Because hon. Members press us over and over again to tell them what the advice has been and who the generals are, and if we tell them the authorities on whom we rest they say we are sheltering ourselves behind them. I think a little common sense can deal with the question of responsibility. The Cabinet, of course, is responsible. I have seen a good deal of administration in the course of my political life, and I warn the House, when the time comes that the War Office and our offices have to be overhauled, not to lose themselves in the quagmire of organisation and responsibility. It is not by fixing the responsibility on paper that you will ever be able to devise a satisfactory solution. There has been too much said on this question as to who is to blame. If the Ministers do wrong you must cashier us. We take the responsibility. Nor can we admit that any individual Ministers should be singled out for opprobrium. We have seen with deep regret the effort which has been made to blame first one Minister and then another. We stand together. It is because they are not able to stand together themselves on the opposite side of the House that they are not able to understand our strong solidarity. So long as the British Constitution is what it is it is necessary that the Cabinet should be treated as a whole. If individual Ministers cannot agree upon a particular point; if they find that insufficient means are given to them by their departments, there is one course for them to pursue—they may resign. If they do not resign they share the responsibility of the Cabinet. On the other hand, if any member of the Cabinet were to refuse to give the necessary sinews of war, if he thought that it was so strong a case that he ought not to support it, he would resign. So long as resignations do not take place, so long the Cabinet must be considered as one whole. If mistakes have been made it is the Cabinet who have made them. We have sought the best advice we could amongst our military advisers. If we have not been able to find the right men it is not the men who are blamable, but it is the Cabinet who are to be blamed for choosing the wrong men, and the Cabinet is responsible. I do not think the right hon. Baronet would wish me to push this doctrine further than I have done. I pass now to the charges which have been brought against the Government. The first broad charge has been elaborated, to a great extent, by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and it is that this is an unnecessary war. In order to prove the charge the right hon. Gentleman went back to 1896; he reviewed and made quotations from a number of Blue-books and went over the whole history leading up to the war. Like the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Berwick Division, I decline to follow him. I believe the House does not desire me to recapitulate the whole of the arguments as regards diplomacy. We are now in the midst of war. To the charges which apply to the conduct of the war it is our duty to reply fully. My hon. friend the Under Secretary [for War] did his best to meet the charges which in that respect are brought against us. I do not think the House wish for an elaborate debate on the causes which led up to the war, but I may here state some broad propositions in reply to the right hon. Gentleman. He said we had no right to insist upon the franchise. The demand for the admission of our fellow-subjects in the Transvaal to the franchise was made, not because we claimed that a particular franchise should be given them, but because we wanted a franchise which would be effective and which would enable the Uitlanders to have such a measure of power as would remove the grievances which undoubtedly existed. The franchise was the means to an end; it was the means for our fellow-subjects in the Transvaal to escape from the intolerable position in which they found themselves. The right hon. Gentleman minimised the grievances under which they suffered. He spoke of the greater output of gold and of their making £26 a month in wages. At the same time, on the evidence of those who were there and of the general feeling of the Uitlanders, they were in an intolerable position of inferiority.

MR. GOSCHEN: I think I ought to receive courtesy from the hon. Member opposite. I say their position was intolerable, and that intolerable position of the Uitlanders operated upon the position of the whole of the British population in South Africa; they came to be regarded as an inferior race. That was the position in which they found themselves in what the right hon. Gentleman called an out-of-the-way corner of the Empire. There must be no out-of-the-way corners in the Empire where British subjects are concerned. We have other colonies, and if we were to act upon such a principle as that, that where there was an out-of-the-way colony, and where our interests are not so concerned, we should abandon our fellow-subjects, then our colonial Empire would soon be gone. [AN HON. MEMBER: The Transvaal is not a colony.] I must ask hon. Members to contain their indignation until I have done and not interrupt me.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): Try to talk sense. [Cries of "Withdraw."]

Fourth Day.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. Member to withdraw that expression.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: In deference to your request, Sir, I will withdraw the expression; I will not ask him to speak sense.

MR. GOSCHEN: This is a very serious debate and a very anxious time, and I am wishing to establish on the broadest possible plan some of the points which ought to be stated shortly in reply to the right hon. gentleman. I do not pursue the point, because I believe the conscience of the country is perfectly clear as to the justice and the inevitable character of this war, and I should be sorry for the Government who in these democratic days endeavoured to make a war of this kind without carrying the country with them. It cannot be supposed that the enthusiasm we have witnessed, that the co-operation of all classes which has been so striking in every direction, would ever have been shown by the common sense of the country if they held the views which are held by the learned professor who preceded me in this debate. The right hon. Gentleman and other speakers, who have passed over the question of the justice or injustice of the war, dealt with the question of the way in which the negotiations were conducted. The right hon. Gentlemen admitted that as far back as the year 1899 the language of the Government was pacifical, but he spoke throughout as if he thought we had been conducting the whole of these negotiations with menaces. [AN HON. MEMBER: And Highbury.] I think that the country generally feels that there was patience, and long-enduring patience. Not only were there the grievances of the Uitlanders, but attempts had been made to break the Conventions in many details, persistently, for many years. I am not sure that we are not more open to the reproach, which some hon. Members bring against us, that we did not show sufficient firmness earlier, than to the charge that we had been too menacing or too aggressive. Now, let me deal with the charge which is made against us, that we did not sufficiently time the sending of the reinforcements which were sent to the Cape and the despatch of the Army Corps with our negotiations. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean said we were entangled in the coils of our negotiations. If it were a fault that during our negotiations we did not send sufficient troops to South Africa, surely the answer to that charge must be that we believed the negotiations, which we hoped would end in peace, would be damaged if they were accompanied by the despatch of troops to the colonies. Ex post facto it may be said we ought to have sent them earlier, and that the information at our disposal was such that regiment after regiment ought to have been despatched to the Cape at an earlier period. But I think there was scarcely a military authority at the time who wished to accompany these negotiations with a military display. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean said it was the common custom now for armies to be massed on the frontier during the process of negotiations. If we had taken that step, war would have been precipitated, and we should not have been in one whit better position than we are now. So soon as it became apparent that there might be a risk of war, we took steps to strengthen the garrisons in Natal and elsewhere, and on that a great discussion has taken place. I am one of those who admit that the information of our Intelligence Department was perfectly sufficient. They put the forces of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State at about 60,000 men, and it is contended now that when we sent 25,000 men to occupy a defensive position, that force was not enough. That is a military question. It is proved, ex post facto, that they were not enough: but I confess, to my own guilt, if the House wishes to insist upon individual guilt, that I could not believe at the time that if we had 15,000 men on the defensive in Natal they would not be able for a month to hold themselves in perfect security against the force which the Boers could put in the field against them. It was possibly a wrong opinion, but that depends, too, upon military operations - it depends upon the Ladysmith entanglement, as it was called - and it is not at all proved that the 25,000 men which we had at that time in Natal were not ample for the purpose for which they were intended. We have been asked over and over again, and I think the right hon. Gentleman opposite also asked, although the question has been answered by the Under Secretary for War, about the advice which was given as regards Ladysmith and the occupation of Glencoe. We did not interfere with the military authorities on the spot on that subject. There, again, I admit, if we ought from here to have arranged the plan of campaign for Natal and for the Cape, you must blame us for not having done so; but I should be very sorry to see the Cabinet undertaking the responsibility of conducting strategical operations in South Africa, at a distance of 7,000 miles, when you had on the spot men who had studied the topography of the country, and advisers on the spot in other directions who were able to solve such questions. I hope that it will not be considered that, if disasters happen, that policy ought to be reversed, and that the Cabinet in this country should undertake the management of a campaign abroad. Fancy giving orders by telegraph to generals 7,000 miles off ordering them to do this or that, and, without even the possibility of a despatch explaining the situation, ordering them by telegraph to occupy such and such a position or to evacuate another position. If we had done that, I do not know whether we should have shown want of foresight, but we should have shown want of judgment, to which the Government do not plead guilty. I plead guilty to the fact that we did not send more than 25,000 men. But, then, there came the declaration of war, and then, and not before, it was arranged that an army corps should be sent out.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): It was before that. The Under Secretary for War said it was on the 29th September.

MR. GOSCHEN: It is a question of dates. At all events, it was decided to send out an army corps, and from that time, as will appear by the statement of the Under Secretary for War, every demand that was made on the spot was immediately fulfilled in the way of sending out further troops. Division after division was sent, and the wishes of our generals on the spot were even anticipated. There has been no slackness, there has been no holding back whatever on the part of the Government. What was asked for was given, and, on many occasions, was given in anticipation of what would be asked for. One of the charges brought against the Government is this—that we have failed to realise the position in which we stand. I think that is a strange charge to bring against a Government engaged in the tremendous task which we have before us at the present moment. Can the House not realise that every disaster, every reverse, and every mishap has brought a deeper realisation to the Government of the responsibility of the burden which they are bearing? Many members of the Government have additional cause for anxiety in the news which arrives from day to day. Then we are told we do not realise the situation. We should scarcely be human if we did not realise the burden placed upon us, and the responsibility which, however imperfectly, we are bearing. We realise the situation. Not only do we look at that situation from the point of view of South Africa, but we have to survey the whole situation of the country at home and in every direction. But I can assure the House that there has been no slackness in that matter. On that point the Admiralty, of course, have their duties and responsibilities, and I can assure the House that since the outbreak of war there has been an unbroken spell of weary, wearing tension and stress. We know the position in which we are. We know the number of transports which are crossing the seas; we know our strong points and our vulnerable points. Some organs of public opinion say the Government have done nothing and are doing nothing to strengthen the defences of the country. How do they know? They cannot know. For my part, so far as our own work at the Admiralty is concerned, I do not intend to do that which, to use a vulgar idiom, has been recommended by some people—to “make a splash.” I think it wiser to do what we have to do quietly, conscious of our responsibilities, looking in every direction, and weighing the pros and cons. I can assure the House that in these anxious times there is no decision I take, either administrative or executive, when I do not bear in mind the position in which we are standing. It would be criminal not to do so, and it would be unwise to on every occasion trumpet forth our strength. For my own part, so strongly have I felt the impropriety at a time like this of doing so, that I refrained during the whole of the recess from making any speech, except a few words to the Volunteers in my own constituency, because I was anxious not to reveal in public either the duties, strength, or preparation, or any portion of that which appertains to the Navy. Being on the subject of the Navy, I may perhaps in this House be allowed to pay a tribute to the assistance which happily the Navy has been able to give to the Army. In these times we have been able to provide them to a certain extent with those heavy guns which have arrived so often, several times in the nick of time, and which have been handled by blue-jackets in the style in which bluejackets are able to manage their guns. I am glad to be able to say that, if we have been in a position to supply a good many guns, we have done so without in any degree depleting our reserves or weakening the total stock of our Navy. I have seen comments in both directions — that we ought to have done more, and that we ought to have done less. We cannot denude our ships of guns. We cannot make those ships inefficient even for a time; and, though there has been an immense desire on the part of gallant bluejackets and marines to be sent in greater numbers to the front, I have to consider that we must have a sufficient number of sailors and marines at home for any mobilisation, if at any time mobilisation should be determined upon. I have seen such suggestions as this — “Why is not a big squadron sent to the Cape?” Send a squadron to the Cape, where there are no ships belonging to foreigners except a few sloops! We are asked to send a squadron to a place where it would have no raison d'être and remove it from a place where it has one. We know the country has been denuded of soldiers and militia. We know that our duties point to the necessity of double watchfulness and double vigilance in every respect. I hope the public will rest assured that there is no apathy at the Admiralty with regard to the present position. It is asked, “Do you realise the situation?” Yes, we realise the situation for good and for bad. We know the strain which has been put upon us. We know how the country has been drained of troops. We know that this is a position in which there might be some temptation to others to take advantage of our weakness. We know that, happily, our relations with the Governments of foreign countries are friendly, and we have nothing to complain of as to the way in which they have treated us. The right hon. Member for South Aberdeen speaks of the enmity of foreign countries.

MR. BRYCE: I did not say “enmity.” I did not use the word.

MR. GOSCHEN: The House knows what I mean.

MR. BRYCE: “Disapproval” is what I said.

MR. GOSCHEN: I took the right hon. Gentleman as saying something stronger. At all events it is suggested that foreign countries are hostile.

MR. BRYCE: Not by me.

MR. GOSCHEN: No; but I am afraid his speech to-day will confirm them in that “disapproval,” because he has been good enough to give a brief to every foreigner to expose the injustice and immorality of the war.

MR. BRYCE: I said what I think the truth, and I have said much less than I would otherwise have said about the policy of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. GOSCHEN: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for the suppression of those other “truths.” I think he has said quite enough if he calls it the truth to supply a brief in times like these to every foreign statesman—no, I will not say statesmen, because they understand our position far better, but to give a brief to the press of every enemy of England. When the right hon. Gentleman speaks of foreign opinion disapproving of our attitude, I should like to know whether, if any one of the great foreign Powers had been in our position in the Transvaal—Germany, for example—there would have been more patience or fewer menaces? I think within their hearts many of the statesmen of Europe must know that our position in the Transvaal has not been compromised in any degree by any menaces or undue action on our part. The interruption has diverted me from my point. But I was speaking of the general position, and showing that we realised the fact that there were dangers, and that the position is serious and grave, and that we are conscious of that gravity.

Then it is said the Government have done nothing and are doing nothing. How can anyone have the face to make that statement, having regard to all the troops we have sent out, and the fact that my hon. friend in this House and Lord Lansdowne in another place have distinctly announced that the Government are elaborating plans which will, in a few days, be brought before the House, and which, we believe, will place the country in a necessary state of defence? We are working at those plans, and, with the Navy as it is and those preparations which will be made, the country need entertain no feelings of insecurity at all. Let us avoid panic. [Opposition cheers.] I suppose I must interpret those cheers to mean that I have exposed the gravity of the situation. There is no panic in my words, and the words I have used will not inspire panic. While the Navy is in its present position, and while the country is showing its resources, while our colonies are pouring troops into South Africa, and while the native princes of India are showing their loyalty, while in all directions the forces of the Empire are arraying themselves to confront a common danger, it would be folly to speak of panic. But what I was anxious to show was that we were aware of the situation in which we stand. We are not blind to the facts, and I confidently hope that nothing I have said will lend itself to the interpretation which I think some hon. Members would put upon it. If I had not said so, it would have been said I was endeavouring to gloss over the present situation and did not realise its gravity. I believe the situation is grave when you send 180,000 troops 7,000 miles across the sea. I realise that we have sent those men away, and that those soldiers are good soldiers. The hon. Member for West Belfast complained that I have spoken with admiration of the "boys" we have sent to the Transvaal. Our definition of "boy" is not a certain definition. Our troops are young, they are still young. If a year ago we had thought of sending 160,000 men 7,000 miles, we should have been told that we should not be able to find them, or, if we did, that we were sending squeezed-out lemons, or boys unfit to be put into the field. At all events, we know the men we have sent are worthy to be in the field, and worthy the best traditions of the Army. We know we are putting 150,000 or 160,000 good sound soldiers in the field, well able to go through the campaign. With the Reservists, again, do you not realise the great success we have had, a success never anticipated by the War Office critics? Then, before I sit down, I must say a word in reference to the colonists. The colonists have been supporting us with unstinted loyalty, with unstinted generosity. There has been shown in the colonies a spirit of affection to the mother country which has been the admiration of the world. May we not suggest that the great loyalty of the colonists is, to some extent, a response, a return for the consideration shown to the colonies for some time past? Is it not right to remember at this time that never before has there been till now a Secretary of State at the Colonial Office who has so endeavoured to win the affections of colonists? You tax us with not having shown judgment and foresight, but at all events the treatment of our colonies at large has encouraged that loyalty which has always existed, and the patriotic impulse of the colonists to come to the assistance of the mother country. I have dealt with the charges brought against the Government; I do not know to what extent I have succeeded in my endeavours, but I feel I ought to add to what has been said by the Under Secretary for War that of course we are every one of us aware how much we have learned for guidance in the future from what has been done. We are perfectly sensible we may have made mistakes, possibly grave mistakes, which it will be our endeavour to avoid in the future. Some of them depend upon principles which I should not wish us to abandon. For instance, there is the principle of not interfering with the military authorities. We are perfectly conscious that we have a great work to do, and we will do it. Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite support an Amendment the object of which is to damage us. It may be the object of some to give us the chance of redeeming our reputation, but the object of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, I presume, is to damage the Government. We are the instrument, for the moment, the imperfect instrument, of the national will. We have to carry through this work. I do not know that hon. Members opposite wish to displace us. I do not know whether they are envious for the burden that rests upon our shoulders. I do not know if they are prepared to take up that burden; but if they are not prepared to take up that burden, is it wise and patriotic to endeavour to shake the confidence of the country by every means in their power, and to put difficulties in our way while we are engaged in conducting operations of war and have called together all the forces of the Empire for the purpose of carrying those operations to a successful conclusion? Is it possible to believe that for the purpose of damaging the Government at a time like this, they summon all their supporters from all parts of the kingdom to meet us in the lobbies in order to weaken us? Suppose there should be what is called a bad division for the Government, the cheers with which that bad division would be acclaimed would be cheers at success in an endeavour to damage the Government. It would be your triumph to have a larger vote than you expected in support of your accusation of want of judgment and foresight. If you could persuade the country as you seem to have persuaded yourselves you would have to step into our places. The time may come for this, and if so, when this war is successfully concluded—and successful it must be—let us be swept away, but do not try to lame the arm of an Executive Government which has to carry through the work we have on hand. There is the hon. Baronet the Member for the Berwick Division, and his friends, who by speeches in the House and on platforms have contributed so much to strengthen our position in the conduct of the war—are they content to go into the lobby where any vote will be counted as weakening us? [“No.”] Someone said “No.” Every vote will contribute to support the impression that we ought to be turned out of office. That is what such a division ought to mean; that is the only constitutional justification for it. I can quite understand some of the speeches which have been made. I fully appreciate the patriotic speeches of the hon. Members for the Berwick Division, South Shields, and Plymouth, and others, but I cannot understand, holding the views they do, why they should desire to weaken the Executive Government. During the recess there was a great deal of patriotic co-operation with us on the part of the Liberal party, and we thank them for it and hope it will be repeated. I believe this is but a break—an interlude between that more patriotic attitude which they assumed a few weeks ago and that patriotic attitude to which we look forward in the future. They assure the country they will support us in going forward with this war notwithstanding the Amendment they have moved. What is infinitely more important than any criticism which may be directed against the blunders of the Government is the work we have to do, and I say again that work shall be done. We have the country with us. We are trustees for the nation in this matter, and from all parts of the Empire we are receiving support; and, so long as we receive that support, God willing, we will fulfil our trust.

*SIR EDWARD CLARKE (Plymouth): I do not desire to offer to the House a controversial speech upon the motion which is now before us, but there are some things that I should very much like to say if the House will give me its patience. They are not at all from a party view, but from my strong feelings in regard to the position in which the country at this moment stands. I do not agree with the complaint that has been made from the Treasury bench of the debate which is now going on. I do not at all believe that the country is taking no interest in this debate. On the contrary, I think the strongest interest is being taken in it from the many aspects of the question which are being dealt with, and I think from day to day the interest that has been felt has been well rewarded. I never knew of a vote of censure moved as an Amendment to the Address that was not complained of by the Government. If the Ministers are sure of a majority they say the debate is a waste of time; if they think they may be defeated they say the motion is factious. I am quite sure that the time which this debate has already taken has not been wasted. I will not speak of other speeches, but the speeches that were made yesterday by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, by my hon. friend the Member for Belfast, and by the Under Secretary of State for War, were speeches of great value to the country and which the country is studying to-day with interest. In regard to those speeches they may not be of so much value taken separately, but the group of them illustrated the military position of the country at the present time, and require to be studied together in order that the people may be instructed as to what is the present position. Therefore I do not agree that this debate is being wasted, and I make the strongest protest against the attack which the right hon. Gentleman has just made upon the right hon. Member for South Aberdeen, whom he has denounced as being a friend of the enemies of this country, because he has spoken what he believes to be the truth with regard to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. That is not a charge which a Minister has a right to make, and I do enter my strongest protest against it. I should like to say that while I think this debate was inevitable, and is, on the whole, doing good, I am very anxious that, if possible, there should be no division when this question comes to be put, and I think the words which the right hon. Gentleman has just addressed to the other side may well be considered by them when they are determining whether they will have a division upon this question. I for one will gladly vote for the Government, because now while the war is raging, when it is impossible for us to stop the war without doing more mischief to our Empire, and producing more misery in the world, we must carry the war to its ultimate conclusion, that is the successful issue of our arms and the establishment of a satisfactory state of things in South Africa. I will gladly vote with the Government, and I do wish that when we come to the end of this debate there will be no recorded division, which, though it will be perfectly understood in this country after the debate, will undoubtedly be misunderstood and misconstrued abroad. An argument has been put forward against which we have a right to protest, and that is the suggestion that the Government cannot be fairly held responsible for those defects which are charged against them with regard to the preparations of armaments, because they would not have been able to get from the House of Commons the supplies which they thought were needed. Now, this is the last Government by whom such a complaint should be made. Since this Parliament began the Government has had an almost unparalleled authority in this House. It has had the support of a very large majority, and there have been domestic circumstances on the other side which have crippled for a time the strength of the Opposition. Indeed, Ministers have actually gone about lamenting that they have not had a sufficiently strong Opposition for the regular and comfortable conduct of Parliamentary affairs. While they have had an overwhelming authority in this House and only a divided Opposition, there is such a completeness of party spirit and party discipline throughout the country that if an old supporter of the Government differs conscientiously from the policy of the day, he is punished by exclusion from Parliamentary life. [HON. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!] Oh, yes; and I am prepared to pay the penalty for having expressed opinions unpalatable to those who have supported me. I do not think it is fair to suggest that it is any excuse for a Government, in such a position and with such a majority, that it cannot be held responsible for the defects charged against them with regard to the preparation of our armaments, because it would not have been able to get the support and the supplies from the House of Commons which they thought were needed. [HON. MEMBERS: No, no!] It has been suggested over and over again.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I never said that.

*SIR EDWARD CLARKE: I am very happy to be assured that the right hon. Gentleman did not say so; but it is perfectly well known that it has been alleged. Let me pause for a moment to say a word regarding the negotiations. The Ministry speak very strongly against those who now discuss the conduct of the negotiations, and the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty has said that the country has made up its mind on this matter. But, Sir, I think, if the Government do not wish these negotiations to be discussed, they had better leave off publishing Blue-books, because the Blue-books published during the present week contain a most remarkable illustration of the course the Government took on a most critical occasion. The position of this question is greatly changed from that which it had when we were discussing it in October last. Then we were not aware of what we now know, that the Government had complete and accurate information in regard to the strength of the armaments and the number of the Boer forces. When, in the light of these Blue-books, we consider the situation as it existed in the middle of September, the course which was taken in sending the despatch of September 8th becomes more and more amazing. On the 6th September a telegram was received by the Colonial Secretary from the Governor of Natal. We are told now that until September 27th nobody thought, and nobody was entitled to think, that the Orange Free State would join the Transvaal. Yet on the 6th September this telegram was read by the Colonial Secretary, who received it from Sir Walter Hely-Hutchinson—

“My Ministers know that every preparation has been made, both in the Transvaal and in the Orange Free State, which would enable an attack to be made on Natal at short notice. My Ministers believe that the Boers have made up their minds that war will take place almost certainly, and that their best chance will be”

—then comes the remarkable phrase—

That telegram came on 6th September. But there is something more than that. Sir Alfred Milner had a few days before that spoken of “the colossal armaments” of the Transvaal, and yet it was on the 8th September that the despatch was written which was said to be an acceptance of nine-tenths of the proposals of the Transvaal Government. And when I read the passage from that despatch that Her Majesty's Government were compelled to regard the proposal of the Transvaal Republic as unacceptable in the form in which it had been presented, I asked the Colonial Secretary “Is it a matter of form?” and the Colonial Secretary in the face of this House said “Yes.” That was on 8th September.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): No, Sir, I cannot believe that I could have said that, although it appears to have been only a hasty interjection. Most certainly the difference was not merely a difference of form. What I think I said was that nine-tenths of the Transvaal Government's proposals would be acceptable, but that the one-tenth that remained was something more than a matter of form.

*SIR EDWARD CLARKE: I do not wish to dwell on the point; but I believe the exact words are to be found in Hansard.* At any rate we know that on the 8th September both the Transvaal and the Orange Free State were arming, and that that warning came to the Government with full information as to the number of the Boer forces and the state of their armaments and ammunition. I will not, however, dwell on that point, but pass to another; and that is whether we do realise now the necessity of not only making a great effort to succeed in this war, but of making that success as speedily as possible. Time is of enormous importance. Ministers are no doubt bound to be reticent, but it is permissible for a private Member to think and to say, when the country is drained of troops, that there are dangers ahead, week by week, arising out of the multiplicity of the difficulties between this country and foreign states, which make it of supreme importance that every effort should be immediately made to put this country in a state of defence. There has been a splendid exhibition of loyalty, courage, and devotion on the part of the country; but national defence cannot be maintained by voluntary subscription. I would hope that within a very short time there will be some very strong movement to organise in this country a force which may be useful to us, if unhappily we are called upon to meet dangers at home, while our army is locked up in South Africa. There is one thing I should like to say in regard to the matter of the future. I am very glad indeed that the Leader of the Opposition did limit his definition of the purpose and object of this war in the way he did. Before the beginning of the debate, a great many people were anxious that the Government should say that this war should never stop until the British flag is planted at Bloemfontein and Pretoria. I can quite understand Englishmen wishing that that may be the ultimate consequence of the war; but it would be a terrible mistake if the Government declared that that was an essential consequence. We do not know what our difficulties may be in the future. Suppose we take it on the footing that this war is absolutely just, and that we cannot escape from it, and were compelled to enter into it from the best of motives. Even then, it would be most unwise for the Government to define the result which was to follow the war, because we might find ourselves in difficulties so great as to compel us to expend, on an object unnecessary and hardly worth the realisation, a force which we have no business to use except for the highest purpose, and for the greatest interests of the nation. I am bound to say from my point of view, and of a great many others in this country, that this war is an absolutely unnecessary war, caused by our diplomatic blundering, and does not represent that which can be truly called the cause of justice. Those of us who think thus look with horror at what is going on in South Africa. We are sending our best and our bravest sons to slay and be slain by men who are as brave and as true-hearted as themselves. This is a thought which, I believe, comes day after day and morning after morning into the minds of many men amongst us, and we pray that something may be done to stay this war. I want to leave it to the Government, when we have succeeded in the first requisite of having cleared our foreign foes from off the territories of the Queen, to make some settlement, honourable alike to ourselves and to the brave people whose conduct in this war has vindicated for them the right to maintain their independence. I plead only for this, that we shall leave open to ourselves the right and the opportunity of making such an honourable settlement at the first moment when we can stay this bloodshed and agony. I do not believe that the annexation of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State would be of the slightest advantage to this country. I believe it would compel us to a great increase in the enormous military expenditure which now presses upon our people, and will press upon them more heavily for some years to come. I do not desire to press my own views on the House, because I realise that they are not popular at the present moment; but I only plead that the Ministry should not pledge themselves to a course of action which may involve tremendous sacrifices in the future. There is one other point I wish to dwell upon. I know the doctrine of Ministerial responsibility. It is a very valuable doctrine in many aspects. It obliges

Ministers to take an active and careful interest in everything that comes before the Cabinet; and when something happens on which the Government is arraigned by a hostile party, it is well that the Ministers should feel that there is a solidarity amongst them. But that doctrine may be carried too far. In this case the real responsibility for this war, be it right or wrong, is with the Colonial Secretary. It is impossible not to see, not to note, from the speeches that have been made of late, that the Prime Minister, who, I believe, is the man in whom all England puts the greatest confidence at this moment—having many other things to deal with, and being distressed by domestic anxieties—may not have been able to attend so closely as he otherwise would have to this matter. But at all events, we cannot get away from this fact, that there are two men—one in this country and one in South Africa—who are the persons looked upon, it may not be by all in this country, but certainly by all in South Africa, as being the persons who have been most closely associated with the beginning of this war. I wish that the highest sentiments of patriotism would induce these two men to leave to others the positions which they now occupy. I must say I myself believe that the greatest difficulty in South Africa in dealing with the solution of many questions that have arisen in this war is the fact that the lines of communication and action in South Africa are with the Colonial Secretary and Sir Alfred Milner. I am not saying a word against their honesty in this matter; but I do say that I believe their presence—one here, and the other in South Africa—would be a difficulty and a hindrance to a settlement. If others were to take their places for a short time— [HON. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!] Oh, yes. This is a great national crisis. It is a time of great and deep anxiety. If others were to take their places for a few weeks, or a few months, if the Prime Minister himself were to take under his own control the communications of the Colonial Office to South Africa, if Lord Rosebery would give his services to the country, and go out to South Africa himself to deal with the solution of these difficulties it would be a sacrifice not too great to ask even from the greatest men amongst us, at the time of national danger, and one for which I believe the country would be very grateful. I have said I was not going to make a controversial speech— [HON. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!] I do not think I have. If I have, it has been with no intention of personal attack, but simply under the conviction that we are now at a time of great national danger, and that we have to consider the things, not only of to-day, but of the future.

*SIR H. MEYSEY-THOMPSON (Stafford, Handsworth): It is very difficult to know the exact position which the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth has taken up. But as this vote of censure has been brought against the present Government, it is necessary to examine for a moment some of the grounds on which it has been brought. The noble Lord who moved the vote of censure left off more than once at the very moments when his speech was becoming interesting. He told us that the general objects which the Government suddenly thrust upon the War Office by embarking them in a great war in South Africa were objects for which the War Office was not organised, and for which Parliament had not voted supplies. Now I suppose that the ordinary Member of Parliament has the idea that the War Office exists to carry on war, or to prepare for war. If these are not the objects of the War Office, I would like to ask the noble Lord what he imagines the organisation of the War Office is for. We hoped to hear this from him, but were disappointed. Then he went on to blame the Government for not having made adequate preparations for the war, for not having troops ready to send to South Africa at the critical moment when they were wanted. He again disappointed us by not pointing out when, in his opinion, the mobilisation of the Army ought to have taken place, and when the troops ought to have left our shores. It is very easy to tell a man that he has taken a wrong road, but the point of the accusation is rather blunted unless you can show that a better road exists which he might have taken. The difficulty, of course, is that in these matters you cannot have a rehearsal. There are 670 Members of this House, and every single one of us will be, in regard to the war, wiser in many respects when it is over than any single person in the world was before it began. But that does not prove the superlative cleverness of every Member of the House of Commons. I cannot understand why, in one respect, our opponents say our Government were wrong. They try to prove that because the difficulties and the losses in this campaign are greater than were anticipated, therefore the Government were wrong to undertake the war; but common sense would lead us to an opposite conclusion. We have in Cape Colony a great many Dutch-British subjects, who have been treated by the Empire with greater kindness and consideration, I suppose, than any other alien race has been treated in the history of the world. If when this war broke out they had said, "We recognise the kindness and consideration with which we have been treated, and we will remain loyal to the British Crown," then we should have said that, so far as they were concerned, there was no occasion to undertake war. Very much the same thing might have been said regarding the Orange Free State. If the Transvaal Republic had proved to be extremely weak, and had put fewer men into the field than anticipated, and if the war had proved to be an easier matter than it has, then our opponents would have said, the Government were wrong in pressing the matter so strongly. But the exact opposite has happened. The Dutch inhabitants of the Cape have proved themselves as disloyal as they dare to be. [HON. MEMBERS: No, no!] Well, that is my opinion. The Orange Free State is in open war against the British Empire, and the Transvaal has proved itself so strong as a military power that it is absolutely certain that if we had been engaged in war with any foreign country at the time when we had only a normal garrison at the Cape, then the Dutch population in South Africa would have swept the English troops easily into the sea. The result would have been fatal to the British Empire. The Cape is the very keystone of the British Empire. If we acknowledge, as I think we must, that the Boers had it in their power to engage in war at the moment which suited them, then the British Empire would exist only at the grace of President Kruger. That is a condition of affairs that could not be tolerated by any Government possible in this country. The late Attorney-General made a very effective speech the other night, which combined enthusiasm, tempered by moderation, and the skill of a great advocate. He said that the war was due to the present Government, and one of the reasons given was that suzerainty had been put forward in an unnecessarily irritating manner by the Colonial Secretary. Now, more than two and a half years ago, the Chief Justice of the Orange Free State told me that the suzerainty over the Transvaal had been the one and only barrier to the fusion of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State. If the suzerainty was the only barrier to the fusion of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State, I do not think it can be said that the suzerainty did not exist. Another statement was made by the late Solicitor-General and the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, which was that if the independence of the two South African Republics were not given back to them we should have to keep a large army in South Africa. That would be the case, no doubt, if these States remained in possession of arms and ammunition, and the money and organisation which enables them to make use of them. But if they have no longer the power of taking the hard-won money of our fellow-countrymen at the gold fields and no longer have the power to organise for war or to purchase arms and ammunition—as they will not have under any system of franchise, or any measure of Home Rule likely to be granted them—then I do not see that any great army in South Africa will be necessary. The whole wealth and intelligence of South Africa is centred in the towns, and with the exception of Pretoria and Bloemfontein all those towns are extremely loyal to the British Empire, therefore, if these two States have no longer their independence, a small army will only be needed there. The late Solicitor-General wants us to undertake to preserve their independence, but what sort of independence? We have been told that true liberty has its limitations, that “my rights end where my neighbour's rights begin,” but the Boer's idea of liberty is, “My rights never end, for my neighbour has none.” After 1881 the Boers were the spoiled children of fortune. They had everything a nation could wish for—a small population, a land as large as Austria, and a climate that was all to be desired. They were free from the dangers of pioneer states; we had conquered the Zulus and the Matabele, who had harassed them, and gave them protection. What did they do?

Sir Edward Clarke.

They had independence, and nobody would have interfered with it if they had behaved properly, but they set to work day by day and year by year to take away all the rights of our fellow-subjects and built up the Government upon the most corrupt system it is possible to conceive. The right hon. Gentleman tried to make out that property was respected in the Transvaal. I cannot agree with him when we know that the taxation per head in the Transvaal is three times as much as in any of the other three States in South Africa, and that at least half a million was taken out of the pockets of the people by the dynamite monopoly alone, the benefit of which went entirely into the pockets of private individuals, and that this and the other most extortionate exactions on account of monopolies, railway rates, and duties were levied not only on the income, but came also out of the capital of those who were sinking and equipping the mines which constituted the source of revenue of the country. Why is it that the Boers were not satisfied? Why run the risk of war by not granting reasonable concessions? That is due to two causes. There are some people so constituted that they cannot help intriguing—it is the breath of their life; and President Kruger is one of them. Before the Transvaal was annexed he intrigued; he intrigued for its independence, and when that was restored he still intrigued. The other reason is, that they were afraid the present state of things in the Transvaal could not last. The gold industry of the Transvaal is exceedingly scientific, and it is difficult to work a poor reef without a great deal of skilled labour. The authorities saw it was impossible for ever to keep these people from their political rights, but they hoped by joining with the Orange Free State and Cape Colony they might be strong enough to sweep out the English, annex their property, and set up a Dutch Republic in South Africa which would be strong enough to resist any force which we could bring against them, and be able to make alliances with foreign Powers. I believe that the reason why they were so extremely stubborn and would not yield in any particular was that they had a dream that they would have in their hands the whole of South Africa with the gold mines, and the diamond mines at Kimberley; and that by making the British, who were the heads of the industry, and the blacks, who were the hands, subservient to the Dutch they could appropriate a large portion of the profits of these industries and live independent and idle lives out of the proceeds of other people's labour. They never meant to give any reforms, and from the moment we insisted war became inevitable. I think quite contrary to the right hon. Member for Plymouth. Lord Rosebery said the affairs of the Empire ought to be carried on in a businesslike manner, and I think it is very lucky that we had a business man like the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary at the Colonial office. Nothing could be more unbusinesslike than the Conventions of 1881 and 1884; but since then the Colonial Secretary has learned something, and having seen the result of those conventions he determined that whatever in future had to be done should be done in a thoroughly businesslike manner. The Government is blamed for not having seen that war was inevitable; but when I was in Johannesburg the view of all sorts and conditions of men there was that if their Government granted this measure of franchise there would be no war. It is not fair to blame the Government because they were not prophets, and because they held a belief which was held by everybody who could be considered to know most of South African affairs. With regard to the number of men it was necessary to send out, the universal opinion in South Africa was that 40,000 or 50,000 would be ample to carry on and win the campaign, and had we not tried to hold Northern Natal and relieve Kimberley, I believe the men sent out were sufficient to keep the Boers in check until reinforcements arrived. The Government cannot be held responsible for the military arrangements that were made, and I think they have been unfairly attacked on that subject. I hold as strongly as I ever held any opinion in my life that the Government were right to raise this question, and were right to press it home, even at the risk of war. They are doing their best to bring the war to a successful conclusion, and I shall give my vote for them.

*MR. C. P. SCOTT (Lancashire, Leigh): I desire to express my admiration of the speech of the hon. Member for Plymouth, which, to my mind, was one of those notable speeches that, by their courage and sincerity, lift the debate far above the range of party, and appeal to every honest man in the country. This is an occasion on which speaking of that kind is needed, for those who have the courage and sincerity to say the truth are the true friends of their country. I think the House will agree that the attack made by the First Lord of the Admiralty on the right hon. Member for South Aberdeen was not called for. The right hon. Member for South Aberdeen's speech was a masterly exposition of the facts of the case, given with great moderation and with complete knowledge. We have heard from the First Lord of the Admiralty a very important statement indeed in regard to the policy of the war. The difficulty some of us are in is to know what we are fighting about, and therefore the terms that should constitute a just and honourable peace. We listened to a remarkable speech made by the hon. Member for the Berwick Division, which is most of all to be admired for the effort to probe some of the root facts of the controversy, and to state for himself and to elicit from the Government what are the objects for which this war is being waged. What did the hon. Baronet say were the two great objects aimed at by the war, the attainment of which would justify the making of peace? They were equal rights between whites in South Africa, and the adoption of measures to make it impossible that hereafter any arsenal should be erected or any accumulation of materials of war should take place except under the authority of the British Government; and the important fact is that the First Lord of the Admiralty, after twenty-four hours reflection, said these terms would satisfy him, and presumably would satisfy the Government also. This throws a light into a very dark place, and the House will do well to examine a little more closely these vital points. I could wish that the right hon. Baronet had explained more precisely what he meant by equal rights between whites in South Africa. It might mean one of two very different things, and as the phrase has been taken up by the Government the House is entitled to seek further explanation as to what was meant by it. If by equal rights to the whites is meant such equal rights as for two generations have existed in the Orange Free State for all immigrants and residents, the solution opens out hopes for peace brighter than any we could hitherto have entertained. The Orange Free State has been a peaceful and independent community, existing without offence in the midst of our South African possessions, and, so far as I am aware, no one has ever complained of any lack of equal rights for white men. If it be the fact that one object of the war is to secure that in the Transvaal also such a state of things should exist, then the object of the war is nearer than, perhaps, many have ventured to hope or believe. The other condition is that no arsenal should be erected or accumulation of arms take place except under the authority of the British Government. This I think a reasonable condition. It is not desirable that there should be great accumulations of arms of this kind, which would obviously threaten a renewal of strife. It is not desirable and is not necessary if this country once for all pledges itself to respect the independence for the defence of which these accumulations and these arsenals were provided. These gigantic military preparations took place, as the evidence seems clearly to show, for no offensive purpose, but from the fear—a well-grounded fear—that the liberties of the Transvaal were endangered. If those liberties are respected on the morrow of victory, not merely as a matter of convenience, but as part of the settled policy of this country, there will be no need for such arsenals and accumulations of arms, and there will be no objection, I believe, on the part of the Orange Free State or of the Transvaal to pledge themselves that they should not take place in the future. The terms upon which this war may be brought to an end is, I venture to think, vital not only for the future but for the immediate present. We are told nothing as to what our policy is to be, and in the circumstances I admit that at the present moment it seems, perhaps, irrelevant, because we are not in a position to impose our policy, whether good or bad. Sir, we must believe—and I believe—that the power of this country will prevail before very long. I think it is certain to prevail ultimately, if our forces are not, as they unfortunately might be, distracted by dangers in other quarters. We must make up our minds as to what we are seeking by this war before we can justify to our own hearts and consciences the spilling of all this blood. It is idle to conceal the fact that there is a deep difference of opinion in this country as to the merits of this war. It is not confined to this side of the House. It is shared by some of the ablest and most conscientious men on the opposite side of the House. How are you going to get unity and common action, unless these two great parties of the State are brought into line? I admit that up to a certain point we should act in common, even though the ultimate objects of the war are not stated. We all agree that the invasion must be repelled. We are all agreed that the power of this country must be asserted to that extent, and to such an extent as may be necessary in order to secure honourable terms of peace. But we do not believe that the war must be carried on at all costs and to all extremities—for what? For the purpose of imposing terms which, as the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth has just stated, so far from being a gain to this country, would be a positive loss—that is, if they mean the suppression of these two States and the annexation of their territory. Let us for one moment consider what are the alternatives. Suppose that we are entirely successful—

*MR. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. Member that the terms of peace are not involved in this Amendment. It is specifically confined to the policy and conduct of the Government in the past. Although I have allowed considerable freedom in the discussion from that point of view, the terms of peace cannot be deliberately discussed upon this Amendment. That question is raised by another Amendment.

*MR. C. P. SCOTT: I will endeavour to conform to your ruling, Sir, and pass over as speedily as possible the remainder of my arguments. I would merely point out that the want of knowledge, foresight, and judgment which have been so conspicuously displayed in the blind way in which we have stumbled into a terrible position, may be equally marked in the future. We cannot carry on this war merely for the sake of a barren supremacy. We must look to what must come after, and consider how the country which we are endeavouring to conquer is to be governed; and I think,

Sir, when we realise what that means—what it means to govern those colonies by military rule, or as Crown colonies permanently, what it involves in the expenditure on military force and in the violation of our best traditions—then I think we might come to the conclusion that it is better to be moderate as well as just, and to respect the independence of these brave people, who have shown themselves to be worthy foes in time of war, and who, if treated rightly now, may in time—a long time it may be—become reconciled to this country. Then instead of being our enemies as we regard them now, they would become one of the most potent factors in a great and united South Africa.

*COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, Ince): The reason I rise, Sir, is to say a word with regard to the military question. I wish to say something with regard to the conduct of the campaign which is now being prosecuted in South Africa, because I fear it may be misjudged owing to reverses our arms have met with hitherto. The Government has sent out a very large body of troops in a very admirable way; they are nearly double the number that Lord Cardwell ever expected to send abroad. We have been obliged to split them into fractions in order to relieve Ladysmith and Kimberley and other garrisons. Now, these fractions have met with serious reverses and loss; and I think that people do not understand how that can be, because I maintain, and have no doubt whatever, that the 100,000 men we have sent to Africa is, as an army, put together in a proper manner, with its proper complement of guns and cavalry, as fine a one, for its numbers, as either Germany, France, or Russia could send anywhere. I am afraid people are apt to think that our army is not what it really is. It is a splendid fighting machine; but our forces in South Africa have been confronted by an enemy possessed of small arms of an immensely improved type, and of Maxims and machine guns, which, together with smokeless powder, make them very formidable indeed. The effect of it all has been to give extremely increased value to the Boer mounted marksmen when acting on the defensive against our forces. They take up a very extended position, and their mobility is extraordinary. Now, I contend that any other force sent to meet this new condition of warfare, which requires new and corresponding tactical conditions to meet it, would have met with just the same difficulties as we have done. I recollect going to Austria in 1867. After the great war of 1866, in which Austria had a very fine army indeed, the world witnessed a new mechanical invention, which paralysed Austria's action in that campaign. It was the introduction of the needle gun. I remember the chagrin that was felt by the Austrian officers, who knew that their army would be misjudged because it had not been able to cope with the latest weapon. What was the result of it? The very next year every Continental Power in Europe adopted the breechloader; and they also adopted Prussia's system of general service, which Lord Clyde characterised as militia. Just as it was then with the innovation of the breechloader, so it is now with mounted infantry. The result of the present conflict has so far demonstrated the wonderful effectiveness of mounted infantry; and every Continental army in Europe will develop that system henceforward. If not it will suffer greatly in future wars. This war has also raised the question of whether our reserves were sent out soon enough, or not. That is a matter which affects diplomacy; and I would point out that there is a great defect in our reserve system. In our reserve system we cannot send a body of troops abroad to meet a military foe unless we call out our reserves; and we cannot call out our reserves except in the case of a great national emergency. Well, that must put our Government into a very difficult position; and I contend that that is a system which requires amendment—reservists should have the option at a higher rate of pay to belong to a "furlough reserve," liable to be recalled for any special service with their regiments. My own impression is that at the end of this war we shall emerge more powerful than ever and more chastened. I trust that the tendency to gasconade which everyone must have noticed of late years will cease. There has been an absence of scouting and of taking cover as there was at the beginning of the Crimean War; but that sort of thing arises from not having been in action against a European foe. That is now past; and I venture to hope and believe that the termination of the war will show the Army in its true light. There has been a lot of talk about the word "supremacy" at sea. It is a word which I think ought to be dropped. Of course, we want a great preponderance of sea power; but in my opinion there is no such thing as supremacy at sea. It is the use of abominable phrases like these which makes us unpopular abroad. It is a comparison which is as offensive in the eyes of our neighbours as it is useless. There is one other remark I would like to make in reference to what fell from the First Lord of the Admiralty to-day. He talked of Cabinet responsibility. Well, if there is one defect in our system which the Cabinet should set themselves to remedy it is that the Commander-in-Chief and the First Naval Lord should be retired on a higher allowance than is given under the present system. They are often poor men who have two or three moves to make in the last few years of their service, and who have to take a house in this expensive capital. These officers cannot resign, though they may differ seriously from the Cabinet, but the country should feel sure that the experts do not differ seriously from the Cabinet.

MR. SPEAKER said the hon. and gallant Member was not now speaking to the Amendment.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Forfar): I do not intend to follow the hon. and gallant Member who last addressed the House in his criticism of the purely military points to which he alluded; I propose to look rather at the political aspect of the matter, not especially as regards the War Office, but as to the responsibility of the Government as a whole. One complaint which has already been noticed from these benches, but which has been repeated again and again by those who have spoken on behalf of the Government, is to me nothing short of astounding. The Liberal party during the whole of this controversy have behaved with the greatest restraint. No Government has ever had a freer hand, a fairer opportunity, less criticism while they were developing their policy, less cause to say they have been hindered by the utterances or the actions of the Opposition leaders either in this House or in the country, than the present Administration. Yet we have had the extraordinary claim made, unsupported by any precedent, unsupported by common sense, and against all experience, that when this House meets no criticism is to be offered, no examination is to take place of the actions of the Government which have occupied the attention of the country for the past few months. This claim would have been unreasonable enough if the policy of the Government had led to a successful issue, but when we remember that this year has been signalised by disasters such as have not been experienced by this country for more than one or two generations, I think such a claim coming from the Government must show that they have either a bad conscience or a very bad case and a very bad defence to offer to the country. What is the House of Commons for if it is not to demand an explanation on the part of the country from those who are trustees for the power of the country, who are responsible for its policy, and who have been placed in the position they hold by the opinion of the country itself? One speech we have listened to with a great deal of satisfaction and interest, and that is the speech of the Under Secretary of State for War. But has not that another aspect from that which has been already noticed? How is it that with our perfect system, with the admirable working of the War Office—to which I am ready myself to give all praise, because the War Office, taken as a whole, has been asked to do greater work than has ever been contemplated by the administrators of the country—I speak broadly, of course—but does not that add to rather than detract from the responsibility of the Government as a whole when we find that, in spite of the working of this system, in spite of the generous and loyal support which they have had from every part of the country and of the Empire, with all their efforts, there has still been, as the Amendment states, so great a lack of foresight, skill and knowledge, as to place us in the deplorable position in which we now stand? It is said that as an Opposition we are not entitled to make this complaint because the Leader of the Opposition during the past summer expressed it as his opinion that there was no reason for war or for military preparations. I do not think that that position is at all inconsistent, as it has been said to be, with the charge made by the right hon. Gentleman only a night or two ago that the Government had done more harm than good in sending out their dribblets of support and reinforcement to the Cape Colony and Natal. The difference between his view, which is shared by others on this side of the House, and the view adopted by the Government is that the policy pursued was a war policy from the beginning, and we protested against it as a war policy—as a policy which might lead to war. The Government denied that that would be its consequence, though I must say I am puzzled to account for the ignorance that led to this result, and that is the difference between us. The Government did not face the fact that by the policy in which they were engaged, the policy of pressing upon the South African Republic reforms which, as the right hon. Member for South Aberdeen said to-night, were outside the Convention, which were matters reserved for the internal control of the Republic—they did not face the fact that by taking up that line and pressing those reforms upon the South African Republic in the way they did they risked the ultimate collision which has come upon us. The policy which was preferred from these benches was a policy not of force at all, but of persuasion, of pressure of diplomacy, rather than of military preparations and of military pressure. I am puzzled beyond measure to understand why the Government have acted in the manner they have. The despatches which we read this morning, to which allusion has already been made, show how the defenceless condition of Natal might have been foreseen, and indeed was foreseen, but not provided for by the Government. If we recollect that Sir Alfred Milner during the greater portion of last winter was at home, and that shortly after his return to South Africa he began the proceedings which terminated as they have, can we dismiss altogether from our minds the idea that he had some prevision that the policy he was going to adopt and enforce might lead to these dangers? Whether that policy was a good one or not I do not intend to enter into at present, but it seems impossible to believe that Sir Alfred Milner, the man responsible on the spot, and the Colonial Secretary, the man in the Cabinet responsible here, did not contemplate the ultimate possibilities of the policy which they were then deciding to adopt. The truth is, the Government have been afraid of the man of whom we have heard so much, the "man in the street;" they were not courageous enough. Perhaps they did not think the country would approve, but they did not come boldly to Parliament or to the country and say, "Here are our responsibilities as Ministers: we have no other alternative but to adopt a policy which may lead to the most extreme conclusion." On the contrary, until as late as March 20th last, there was not the slightest symptom in the speech delivered in this House by the Colonial Secretary that the mind of the Government had changed, that the position in South Africa had changed, or that there was any intention on the part of the Government to depart from the policy which had hitherto been the common policy of both parties. There is a great deal of talk as if on this side of the House there was no recognition of the difficulties in South Africa. What is the fact? Take whatever cause or whatever contributory cause you like as having brought on this war, take the question of the grievances which has been argued at such length before this House: as a matter of fact the opinion expressed by the Colonial Secretary on March 20th last in regard to those grievances is precisely the opinion held on this side of the House. If the House will pardon me I should like to read one passage. In reply to the hon. Member for the Ecclestone Division of Sheffield, the Colonial Secretary said (the hon. Member having urged the grievances of the Uitlanders)—

"My hon. friend comes here as if he had authority to speak in their name, but I am very much inclined to think that if we were to adopt his advice the Uitlanders themselves would be the first to quarrel with us on that subject, and they might ask why we had interfered when we were not asked."

Then the Secretary of State for the Colonies goes on to repudiate the idea that there had been any breach of the Convention with regard to these grievances. He says—

"In the first place we may intervene if there is any breach of the Convention, but it is not contended so far as I know that any of these things to which my hon. friend refers are breaches of the Convention."

And he wound up by saying—

"Sir Alfred Milner is on the spot, but I do not feel at the moment that any cause has arisen which would justify me in taking the very strong action which seems at all events to have been suggested by my hon. friend."

That was the opinion of the Colonial Secretary so recently as March 20th last ; that was the policy of the Government so recently as that date, and that being the case I think the First Lord of the Admiralty has very little cause to charge us on this side of the House as he did to-night with minimising the grievances which are suffered by the Uitlanders residing in the Transvaal. Then we come to the theory of the armed conspiracy. I always listen with great attention to the remarks of the hon. Member for the Handsworth Division of Stafford. He has been in South Africa ; he has given great attention to the question ; he has studied it apparently very deeply. But I entirely disagree with some of his facts, and I should like to have controverted them if he had been in the House, both as to the history of South Africa and as to the present situation. One remark I cannot help noticing, and that is the assertion that he made with regard to the Dutch in Cape Colony. The hon. Member took upon himself the responsibility of saying that the conduct of the Dutch in Cape Colony had been most disloyal. I cannot believe that that opinion is shared by many members on the other side of the House. That that opinion should even be expressed in this House is, I think, much to be deprecated on the present occasion. No one knows without having been to South Africa the trial and strain and tension that have been put upon our Dutch fellow-subjects in Cape Colony, and I think, considering how their feelings have been harrowed and their property destroyed, and their responsible Government practically entirely suppressed during this crisis, it is in the highest degree necessary that we here, feeling for them just as we do for the others in the colony, should do our best to support them in their trials and to assure them of our confidence, and show that we recognise their loyalty and devotion under circumstances of supreme anxiety and difficulty. What is at the bottom of this theory of an armed conspiracy throughout South Africa ? Could anything be more baseless ? Think of the position of our Army now in the north of the colony. Think of that, and couple it with an armed conspiracy, not in theory but in reality, and you will have some idea of the loyalty of the Dutch and of the value of their loyalty to us at the present time. Perhaps I may be allowed to remind the House of the statement of the Colonial Secretary yesterday, bearing out what I say about the constitutional Government of the Cape having been practically superseded at this time of crisis. It will have been noticed that the right hon. Gentleman said that the Volunteer forces now being raised in the Cape Colony are being raised by the general officer commanding there under the authority, not of the responsible Minister, but of the Governor himself. There is only one other point to which I should like to allude, simply to endeavour to convey the impression that everyone on this side of the House is not, as some seem to think, blind to the difficulties and the circumstances which have brought about this present crisis, though we may not approve the methods adopted by the Government for remedying those difficulties. No one who has followed the controversy during the last few years will deny that in regard to Article II. of the Convention of 1884, which binds the South African Republic to keep within its own strict boundaries, the Boers have, in regard to Bechuanaland, in regard to the efforts to obtain a seaport, in regard to some of the native districts, in regard to the northern parts of Africa, just as in regard to Stellaland and Goshenland, gone outside the limits not only of their own territory, but of the Convention of 1884. Undoubtedly that can be charged against them ; undoubtedly that, supported as it has been by the intrigues and negotiations carried on with Germany and other Powers, lends colour to the idea that the South African Republic is not contented with its present status, and has ambitions, and that its young men do "dream dreams," and have ideals of a South Africa different from the South Africa which we should like to see. That is all quite true, and I think it may be perfectly well admitted. That is common ground, and as a matter of fact has been recognised by both parties in this House. These grievances, the aspirations of some of the Dutch in South Africa, the difficulties that have ensued in getting the South African Republic to keep strictly within its boundaries—these, I say, are common ground to, and have been recognised by, both parties. In support of that I will only quote the fact—it does not cover all these points, but it covers some—that a despatch prepared under the direction of Lord Ripon in 1894, but not sent to the Transvaal at that time, was included and sent by the present Colonial Secretary in the year 1896 as a complete, careful, proper, and suitable statement of the case of the grievances we wished to see remedied. It is only when we come to the remedies that we differ, and there we do differ. We are asked what we should have done. We should have followed the policy which had been followed hitherto of endeavouring to establish friendly terms with the Transvaal, of endeavouring to increase the confidence which, by the testimony of all competent observers in South Africa, had sprung up between the people, and which had not been interrupted even by the question which arose at the end of 1895, the question of the closing of the Vaal Drifts. That state of things unfortunately was upset by the raid. The raid was bad enough; the South African Committee was bad enough; but worse than all has been the complete identification of Her Majesty's Government with the policy of the gentlemen most distasteful in South Africa. I have not had the privilege of going to South Africa, but I have done my best so far as papers, books, and conversation go to become acquainted with it, and the impression which remains indelibly fixed upon my mind is this: in South Africa for all these difficulties what was preached was patience. The people there are the main sufferers by the unsettled and troubled state of their country, and you can go to Ministers of both parties in the Cape and to Ministers in Natal; you can go to the most responsible and respected people in the country, and one and all will advocate the policy expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose, the policy of patience, the policy which has been so much spurned and contemned in the debates in this House.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Will the hon. Gentleman name one who would advocate that policy?

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: I will not only name him but read out his opinion, if the House will allow me. The first one I will take is a gentleman to whom the hon. Member for Derby made allusion the other night, Mr. Du Toit, who was at the time President of the Afrikaner Bond. He moved a resolution in the

Captain Sinclair.

Cape House of Assembly, and it was carried by a large majority—this was in April, 1897—

“deprecating war between European peoples, and expressing an earnest desire for peace and the conviction that these objects would best be attained by the faithful and reciprocal observance of all obligations under treaties, conventions, and agreements; that means should be devised to obtain a settlement of any difficulties which might arise in the interpretation of such obligations; and by the adoption of a policy of moderation, mutual consideration, and fairness, the tranquillity of South Africa would be further assured.”

An amendment was moved, different in words, but the same in sense, urging strict observance of the Convention, and a policy of moderation by Her Majesty's Government. Then I will quote the Premier of Natal, who was here in 1897, and who, if my memory serves me rightly, has since died—Mr. Escombe. He said this at a public dinner given in his honour in London—

“As for the South African Republic, at present it was not fully understood, and people in England would, on close inquiry, be astonished to find how much good there was in the Dutch population in that part of the world.”

Lastly, I will quote Sir Gordon Sprigg, who cannot be suspected of any Afrikaner leanings. At Cape Town, as Premier of the colony, he said that—

“If he went to England as Prime Minister, representing the colony, he would, in his speeches and conversations, on every opportunity presented, explain to the people of England the real condition of affairs in the country, showing how in South Africa there was not a homogeneous population as in Europe, and that the majority of the colonies were differently circumstanced.”

That is the point I want to bring out.

“He would point out how necessary it was in all matters to pursue a very cautious policy, and that they, above all things, wanted moderation and patience—everlasting patience—in this country. In fact, patience seemed to him to solve almost every question in South Africa. Without patience they could solve no question satisfactorily, and that was what they should endeavour to impress upon the people of England and Her Majesty's Ministers. . . . If the Cape Government were allowed to pursue their policy peace would be maintained in Africa. The Transvaal, he believed, would shortly recognise the desires of the inhabitants, and friendly relations and prosperity would be maintained.”

There are many other utterances of public men who have held the highest positions in those colonies in exactly the same sense as those I have quoted, and I say therefore that it is not wisely said or wisely thought that the policy of patience is not a proper and possible alternative to the policy of force which has been adopted by Her Majesty's Government. In my humble opinion the raid, the South African Committee, and the policy of the Secretary of State for the Colonies have had the effect of inducing a large number of people in this country to share the views so eloquently expressed to-night by the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth, and have contributed to form the conviction that we cannot possibly have that basis of confidence between us and those who are unfortunately our enemies at present on which reconciliation may begin, unless the negotiations fall into other hands than those of the present Colonial Secretary. The policy of the Government is responsible for this. I am not blaming those gentlemen personally, but I say that they have by their public acts so thoroughly identified themselves with all the interests most opposed, most disliked, and most detested by the inhabitants of the South African Republic and those who sympathise with them in South Africa, that their continuance in charge of these matters is a most powerful barrier to peace and reconciliation. During those dreary days in September and October last, when we were waiting to know what would be the result of the Colonial Secretary's last despatch, day after day inquiries came from South Africa as to when the Republic was to be informed of the further demands which he had announced he was going to make upon them. There was a Cabinet Council held during that time, and it was very remarkable that after that Cabinet Council no less than four Cabinet Ministers spoke during the week—Lord James of Hereford, the First Lord of the Treasury, and two others (I had the advantage of listening to the words of the First Lord myself)—and in the most solemn terms they all affirmed that they did not wish to threaten the independence of the Transvaal, but all these four Cabinet Ministers, having, I am perfectly certain, the confidence of the country in the sincerity and truth of their words, with all their authority and influence both here and in South Africa, were not able to allay the suspicions of the South African Republic. The end of that dreary time of waiting was that the step was taken, the ultimatum was issued, and we have been plunged into this war. I say that, apart from the present situation altogether, apart from the particular difficulties we are in, apart from the particular objections which I have urged, apart from the evidence which I have quoted from South Africa against this policy, we are fighting against all experience of colonial administration in this matter. The normal course of colonial government is self-government. Perpetually in the history of self-government in this country, when the desire of the central authority here, of the Imperial Government, call it whatever you like, has been asserted over the colonies under one set of circumstances or another, every time it has led to disaster. The interference from Downing Street, the overruling of colonial interests and colonial opinion, has never been attended with success in any part of the world. That experience is another thing against which we are fighting at the present time. We are fighting also against the goodwill of the Dutch, against the goodwill of men who have been contented, happy, and prosperous under our Government, whose loyalty has been unquestioned until this time, men who have readily rendered a loyal devotion to the Queen and Government under which they have had this happiness and prosperity. Another thing against which we are fighting—and it is a powerful thing—is our own solemn promise and convention. ["No!"] There are two opinions possible, I admit. Hon. Gentlemen opposite may hold their view, but in my humble judgment it counts for something in this controversy that we are fighting practically against our own solemn promise and convention. I do not deny—and I have given reasons—that some readjustment in South Africa was necessary. Anyone who has followed the extension and development of our dominions in South Africa, who remembers that in less than thirty years we have practically multiplied by six the extent of our territory in South Africa—we have now about 1,500,000 square miles to be responsible for instead of about a quarter of a million—anyone who remembers that will admit that some readjustment was inevitable and necessary. I say that it does count for something in this deplorable business that, in the opinion of a great many people, we are fighting and using the whole forces of the Empire against what, after all, has been a solemn promise and convention undertaken in the name of this country. And what have you to look forward to? The English have got to live with the Dutch. This is the third contest we have had with the Dutch. Some 40 or 50 years ago the Governor, who afterwards was very popular, Sir Harry Smith, had to take forcible measures against the Boer population north of the Orange River. The dispute was settled by one battle, and British authority had its way. Twenty years later we had another contest with the Dutch north of the Vaal River. You know how that terminated, and you know that in the opinion of the highest military authorities not a couple of thousand men, as on the former occasion, but 15,000 men at least would have been needed to assert our authority or sway on that occasion. Now, twenty years later, you have got a much larger difficulty on your hands. You have got a difficulty which I do not believe the people of this country would have had to face had they known — [The remainder of the sentence was rendered inaudible by cries of dissent from the Ministerial Benches.] Yes: that is exactly a point on which I should like to say something. People say that the shibboleth has to be repeated with regard to this war as to whether it was just or unjust. That does not exhaust the considerations which have to be taken into account. You have got to look at this matter from a practical point of view, from the point of view of the practical interests of the country and of the Empire as a whole. I say that it requires more reasons than have ever been urged against the policy of moderation to outweigh the enormous present and future disadvantages which have been disclosed by the expedition and the results of the expedition so far which we have sent to South Africa. We shall have to add another 100,000 men to the Army in the interest of South Africa, owing to the difficulty of reconciling the Dutch to our rule. I do not think that even then you will get rid of all those difficulties. I thank the House for allowing me to give the few reasons which induce me to vote with great heartiness for the Amendment of my noble friend. I recognise the patriotic endeavours the Government are making

to the full, but I deplore and lament the policy, and the consequences of that policy, which has led us into the present difficulties. I shall at present do my utmost to give my support to the Government wherever it is possible, but I do not hesitate to say that I shall work against them if I think it is necessary, and in the councils which are to determine this war I hope there will be moderation, firmness, and patience.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I only desire to say a few words to the House on the subjects of departmental interests, which we feel very strongly about. I listened to the speech of the right hon. Member for South Aberdeen with a certain amount of mild surprise, when he said he regretted that feelings of hostility were apparent in foreign countries with regard to this nation, because there is no man who has done so much to raise hostility as himself. I listened to the speech of the Under Secretary for War last night, a speech which, I venture to say, raised the level of the debate, but I do not agree with him. He said we had increased the artillery by sixteen batteries, and we had strengthened regiments in that direction, but he forgot to say that the Estimates had increased from £16,000,000 to £21,000,000, and he forgot to say that our Army had so far been held in check by a population which was hardly so large as the number of men we ourselves usually keep under arms. What has surprised me is the light-hearted character of some of the speeches delivered, and also the consensus of opinion that it was necessary to defend the War Office, which was shown in half the speeches made. The mover of the Address, the Leader of the House, the Leader of the Opposition, Lord Salisbury, all did so. Even the mover of this Amendment, after he had searched the world from China to Peru to endeavour to find a stick with which to beat the Government, turned round and took the War Office under the ægis of his protection. I should just like to say half-a-dozen words with reference to the speech at Manchester by the Leader of the House, following in that regard the speech of the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean. The right hon. Gentleman found fault with the stay-at-home politicians and War Office critics, but it is not their fault that they are stay-at-homes, they would be elsewhere now if they knew how to get there. With regard to the critics, the right hon. Gentleman said the War Office had been efficient, and referred to the Reserves. Now, the Service Members of the House of Commons never did criticise the Reserves. The man who did criticise the Reserves was Lord Wolseley. He said the Reserve was simply a sham, and he showed an intuitive perception of the opinion of the House of Commons by saying that they desired to have it so. We do not believe in the three Army Corps. An Army Corps as one understands it is an entity, but in South Africa you simply have an aggregation of regiments pitchforked together, as you had in the Crimean War. In the speech that was made last night, it was said that the Government were right and the War Office had done nothing wrong, and that it was impossible to supply transports at a moment's notice. The hon. Gentleman asked how you could put 18,000 mules in line in South Africa. That is not what we meant. What we meant was that until President Kruger marched his troops to the borders of the Transvaal the War Office made no effort to provide transport. With reference to the guns the hon. Gentleman took up the cudgels and said there was a force of something like 180,000 men at the front, with 240 field guns and several guns of position. That is all very well as far as it goes, but it is not the proper allowance. In European armies the proportion of guns to infantry is 5 per 1,000, but, on the hon. Gentleman's own showing, in South Africa there are only $2\frac{1}{2}$ per 1,000. There are only a few quick-firing guns there at the present moment, and they are the old-fashioned ones with the breech-firing attachment of Sir George Clarke. Then with regard to proper maps, the hon. Gentleman said the reason why proper maps were not prepared was because in the first place the colonial authorities ought to have prepared them, but did not, and secondly, because of the expense. I believe that the loss at Spion Kop was due entirely to the fact that the topographical character of the country had not been found out. Then again, with regard to transport, the man in the street does not understand why, when it is necessary to send troops out quickly, we should have slow ships instead of fast ones. And with regard to troops, the hon. Gentleman said this country was bursting with troops, but he could not have visited our garrison towns lately or he would have seen that our troops here consist of immature youths, not old enough to be sent abroad, dismounted cavalry, artillery without guns, and a few troops that are going to be sent off during the next few weeks. These are some of the questions which the Service Members have called the attention of this House to, and some of the matters we have endeavoured to bring before it; and the country will find that the Service Members have told them the truth rather than the apologists of the establishment in Pall Mall. So far as I am concerned my opinion is clear, and I shall support the Government here and outside. And when the crisis is over I shall be able to criticise more, as I please, the operations of the War Office.

*MR. BRYN ROBERTS : I think the right hon. Members opposite who are so disposed to denounce the right hon. Member for South Aberdeen would do their own cause far greater good if, instead of denouncing him, they took to answering his arguments and displacing the irresistible case which he has made against this Government. This debate has branched out in two directions. One branch, of course, is the justification of the war and the other the question of the conduct of the war. With reference to the conduct of the war, we have had very full answers from the Government benches, but with reference to the question of the justice and right of this war not one word has been said, for the simple reason, in my belief, that they have adopted the only possible mode of answering the question by avoiding it. I hope hon. Members on this side of the House will not permit that to be done, but that they will urge the point in question until a full answer is given. Even in the last debate of the last session it was the same. No defence was given until the Colonial Secretary rose on the last night of that debate, and we have had no defence beyond that. We have had various reasons assigned for this war, as various and contradictory as the reasons assigned for the war in the Soudan, but when I find people in business, or in social or political life, give various and contradictory reasons, I generally find that the real one is one which they dare not avow. My belief in this case is that the real reason of this war is to get hold of the Transvaal, or at least the political control of it. With regard to the alleged Dutch conspiracy, that matter has already been fully dealt with, and I shall only draw attention to one or two matters. It is based entirely on the fact of the large armaments in the Transvaal. But before you can establish a case of this kind you must prove that the armaments are too numerous, not from our point of view, but that they are excessive in the view of the Transvaalers themselves; that they exceed the amount which they can possibly consider necessary for the defence of their country. The attempt is now practically abandoned. We set up the point that these armaments were laid up before the raid. That was practically given up or destroyed at any rate by the right hon. Gentleman by his speech at Manchester. He said the raid fettered the Government, that it was impossible for them to remonstrate with the Transvaal on account of the armaments because of the raid. That must prove that the excessive armaments were laid up after the raid because that remark would not be relevant if they were laid up before the raid. It is now admitted that the Intelligence Department has fulfilled its functions fully, but it is an irrefutable fact that the raid caused the armaments. As far back as March, 1886, Sir Hercules Robinson telegraphed that the arming movement was defensive and not offensive, that the Boers believed that the raid was connived at if not instigated by the Government, and that it would be renewed on the first favourable opportunity. President Kruger himself said to Captain Younghusband, the special correspondent to The Times, "So long as you never attack us we shall not attack you." [AN HON. MEMBER: But he did attack us.] Yes, because we were going to invade the Transvaal. We pride ourselves on the enthusiasm that has been shown by volunteers coming in, but the Boers have commanded all men between the ages of sixteen and sixty, and if we made similar sacrifices for this war 6,000,000 men would be at the front. It is impossible to believe that any democratic nation would send all its male inhabitants to wage an aggressive war. Such a sacrifice would only be made for one of the two strongest motives that can impel human nature—one the defence of religion, the other the defence of our nationality. Would we do it? I hope we would for the defence of our religion. But it is said they are compelled by President Kruger, who is really an autocrat. He is an autocrat who rests entirely on the goodwill of his burghers, the same as Mr. Gladstone rested on the conviction of his supporters. There was this extraordinary phenomenon, that although this dispute had been going on for years, yet there was not a single suggestion in all the despatches in the Blue-books of any complaint that the Boers wished to drive the British people out of the country. There was a distant allusion in a letter sent by Sir Alfred Milner on 4th May last to the Colonial Secretary, in which he said that some newspapers had made some reference to that. But we know that there are wild papers in the Transvaal, just as there are in Fleet Street. It is impossible to get away from the fact that there is no ostensible cause for this war in the Blue-books except the alleged grievances of Uitlanders. I think that hon. Members who are against the war have been a great deal too free and liberal with their concession as to the existence of these grievances. I do not admit the grievances, except to a very slight extent. Hon. Members who talk about them always do so in vague and general terms. You never see a reference to a single detail, but only to the "intolerable oppression of the Uitlanders," and vague statements of that kind. What are these alleged grievances? Why, one is that a public meeting in the Transvaal was disturbed, whereas the opponents of this war in this country have had their meetings broken up on scores and hundreds of occasions by Jingo roughs. You know what took place in Trafalgar Square, but does anyone suggest on that account the English people should be deprived of their Government? There is no restriction whatever in the Transvaal on the right of public meeting, provided these are held in halls. The only restriction is as to open-air meeting, and that restriction is the same as regards meetings in Trafalgar Square. Permission has to be got from the police because of the danger of the public meeting creating riot and disturbance, and that permission is never refused. It is said that the press have been restrained, but there has not been a single case of a newspaper being suppressed under the law complained of, except that of the Critic, which was edited by the notorious Henry Hess, who had to leave the country on account of fraud and perjury. We know that this Mr. Hess brought an action against Mr. Henry Labouchere on account of an article which appeared in Truth, but he abandoned it and paid the costs rather than appear in court to answer the interrogatories. President Kruger went beyond his rights in suppressing the Johannesburg Star, but an appeal was made to the Transvaal courts, and from that time forward the Star was allowed to be published. That illustrates the falsity of the charge against the judiciary, for here the Courts quashed the order of President Kruger. Then we come to the question of the franchise, which, after all, is the really important question. My hon. and learned friend the Member for South Shields denied that the Uitlanders were aliens, and attempted to maintain that denial by the most extraordinary arguments. He said that the Uitlanders have the right to enter the Transvaal, to reside and trade there, and that aliens have not that right. Why, that right exists in this country as well as in the Transvaal. There is no power in this country, not even in the Crown, to prevent the entry of aliens here and engage in trade. We have the fact that the Member for the Central Division of Sheffield has introduced time and again, but has been unable to pass, a Bill to prevent aliens coming to this country. But there is this difference, that most of the Uitlanders who come into this country do so with the intention of remaining here, whereas four-fifths of the Uitlanders who go to the Transvaal do so with the intention of returning to their native country when they have made their fortune. Under these circumstances it is not to be expected that these should be granted the franchise to the same extent as in England, because they would use it not in the interests of the Transvaal, but of the country to which they intend to return. I utterly deny that the Uitlanders' grievances were great down even to the initiation of the negotiations, and are we to make war on any government which falls away in the slightest degree from perfection? If so, what are we to do with our own Government? I venture to say that the grievances of the Uitlanders, when examined and divested of exaggeration, were of the flimsiest description, and of the same character as exist in every country under the sun, and will exist until the millennium. Suppose that President Kruger had passed a law, as had been done in this country by the present Government, that all agriculturists and landowners should be exempt from one-half the taxation, and that the Imperial funds should be applied to pay the exempted half for them, and that all shopkeepers and dwellers in town should pay in full, there might have been a cause for remonstrance. Or suppose that President Kruger had passed a law that the old Doppe Church, being in a minority of the whole population, should have the control of religious education in schools which were maintained almost entirely by the Imperial taxation of the country, then the Uitlanders might have claimed that they suffered from serious grievances. Why, the whole of the Uitlanders' grievances put together were not to be compared with a single one of these from which we suffer in this country; and yet, we who feel these grievances keenly have not the remotest idea that they would justify us in seeking to stir up rebellion. We rely for their redress on ordinary methods of political evolution. And so all those trifling grievances would have been remedied in time by the ordinary evolution of political change. We are told that the case was urgent, but the only reason for urgency that I know was the risk that in the meantime the Rand mines would be exhausted and all these Uitlanders would then be coming home. But I hold that even if the grievances did exist to an intolerable extent there was the unanswerable argument that we had no right to interfere. It has been admitted over and over again that the Transvaal was an independent Government so far as regards internal affairs. Lord Salisbury has said so, the First Lord of the Treasury admitted it, and so did the late Right Hon. W. H. Smith. I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that at the time when the Colonial Secretary was endeavouring to prevail on President Kruger to come over to this country, to discuss matters, President Kruger objected, on the ground that the discussion of these grievances would be a tacit admission on his part of the right of this country to interfere in the internal affairs of the Transvaal. And what was the answer of the Colonial Secretary to that objection? He said—

"Her Majesty's Government do not claim any right under the Convention to prescribe the particular reforms which should be made in the South African Republic. . . . They consider that they are entitled to make such friendly representations on behalf of British subjects."

And he goes on to say—

"Such a discussion as they contemplate would not involve any acknowledgment on the part of the President of a right of interference in the internal concerns of the Republic, but would only, at the most, amount to a recognition of the friendly interest of Her Majesty's Government in its security, and in the general welfare of South Africa."

And then there is this further important admission—

"The President would be, of course, at liberty to accept or reject any advice that might be tendered to him by Her Majesty's Government."

What did the right hon. the Colonial Secretary say in this House in answer to a speech of the hon. Member for the Ecclesall Division of Sheffield? In March last that hon. Member made an attack on the Government because they did not make the grievances of the Uitlanders a casus belli, and the Colonial Secretary said—

"Does the hon. Member wish this Government to send an ultimatum to the Transvaal Government on these matters? Does he wish us to insist upon the reforms which my hon. friend brings before us, and, failing satisfaction, does he expect us to go to war with the Transvaal?"

At that time it was regarded as ridiculous that this question should lead to war. Further on the Colonial Secretary said—

"There are certain clear cases where we can intervene, and rightly intervene, in the Transvaal. In the first place, we may intervene if there is any breach of the Convention; but it is not contended, so far as I know, that any of these things to which my hon. friend refers are breaches. Then, no doubt, we should have the usual right of interference if the comity of nations is not observed—that is to say, that the treatment of British subjects in the Transvaal of such a nature as would give us the right to interfere as to the treatment of British subjects in France or Germany. When we have been asked to interfere, and when we have not interfered, it has been because we have been advised that no such case has arisen for interference."

Every one of the Uitlander grievances, with one exception, were in existence long before these words were uttered. The only exception was the failure to discover the murderer of Mrs. Appleby. It does not rest with the Government of a country in which Jack the Ripper ran riot, and where there was a total failure to discover that terrible murderer, to complain of a failure to discover one murderer in the Transvaal. It should be remembered that the Transvaal Government issued a reward of £500 for the apprehension of Mrs. Appleby's murderer, and that the police of Johannesburg were increased. There has been absolutely no change in the situation since then. It has been argued that although there was no Convention right to exact amelioration of these grievances, yet President Kruger made promises during the negotiations for the Convention which he has failed to perform. That is not true. Certainly most unfortunate misrepresentations have been made in the press and in this House in regard to that matter. During the conversations which led up to the Convention of 1881 the President of the Conference asked Mr. Kruger, "Before annexation had British subjects complete freedom of trade throughout the Transvaal: were they on the same footing as the citizens of the Transvaal?" To which Mr. Kruger replied, "They were on the same footing as the burghers; there was not the slightest difference in accordance with the Sand River Convention." The President said, "I presume you will not object to that continuing;" to which Mr. Kruger replied, "No, there will be equal protection for everybody." Sir Evelyn Wood interpolated, "And equal privileges!" When Mr. Kruger replied, "We make no difference so far as burgher rights are concerned. There may, perhaps, be some slight difference in the case of a young person who has just come into the country." Later on it was explained that the proper translation and proper meaning of "young person" had reference to the age of the person, not to the length of his residence in the country. [Hon.

Captain Sinclair.

MEMBERS: Oh, oh!] Well, I quote Question 1037. Dr. Jorissen said in answer: "At No. 244 the question was, 'Is there any distinction in regard to the privileges or rights of Englishmen in the Transvaal?'" and Mr. Kruger answered, "No, there is no difference," and then he added, "There may be some slight difference in the case of a young person just coming into the country." I wish to say that that might give rise to a wrong impression. What Mr. Kruger intended to convey was this: According to our law, a new comer has not his burgher rights immediately. The words "young person" do not refer to age, but to the time of residence in the Republic." I want to draw the attention of the House to the fact that my hon. and learned friend the Member for Haddingtonshire in the last session of Parliament quoted this answer, but omitted the latter part of it referring to the exception as to new-comers. I shouted at the time for him to read on, I am afraid rather violently, because at the moment I thought the omission was designed. I do not say that now, but at any rate it seems that it was an important omission. The whole case depends on that qualification. Before a single word of complaint was uttered as to the franchise question, all the persons who had come into the Transvaal at the time this conversation took place would have received the franchise under the then existing law. The question does not rest there. Hon. Members will observe that in this connection two matters were discussed, namely, trading rights and burgher rights. Sir Hercules Robinson made reference to trading rights, and the assurance was given him on that behalf. Then Sir Evelyn Wood went on to ask about political rights. My point is that the question of "trading rights" was dealt with in the Convention, and these rights were given and accepted, but that the "political rights" were rejected. The mere fact that political rights were not introduced into the Convention shows that the omission of political rights was intended. There have been broken promises, but the pledge breaker does not reside in Pretoria, but nearer home. We all know that Dr. Jameson and his confederates were taken prisoners in accordance with the fortunes of war. The Colonial Secretary interceded for their lives on hearing a rumour that they were going to be shot. He telegraphed to President Kruger on January 3rd, 1896—

"It is rumoured here that you have ordered prisoners to be shot. I do not believe it, and rely on your generosity in the hour of victory."

President Kruger replied that they were not going to be shot, but would be dealt with according to law. Thereupon the Colonial Secretary directed this telegram to be sent. (He had five or six days before written to the Chartered Company to tell them that one of their obligations to this country under the London Convention was to respect the internal independence of the Transvaal Government.) This was the Colonial Secretary's reply to President Kruger on 5th January—

"I thank your Honour for your message, which I will publish as you desire. The press have not given credence to the rumours about cruelty to the prisoners; and for myself I have always felt confidence in your magnanimity. I have sent an Imperial officer to Bulawayo to see that my orders are obeyed, and to prevent the possibility of any further raid; and your Honour may rest confident that I will strictly uphold all the obligations of the London Convention of 1884."

Six days before that promise was made he publicly acknowledged that one of the obligations was the internal independence of the Transvaal. He secured the lives of the prisoners on the assurances given; but the history told by the different books shows that, in dispatch after dispatch, the promise made by the Colonial Secretary has been broken; and still the supporters of the Government retain a Minister in office who has departed from his pledged word, and who goes about the country denouncing the men whose clemency he has acknowledged, and urging the country to go to war with them. I will only deal with another matter in connection with the cause of the war. I will tell the House what was the real cause of it. It may be summed up in one word, "Bluff, bluff!" I am perfectly certain that the country never intended to go to war on account of these grievances. We were assured by the Cape press that we had only to be firm in our attitude and point our cannon at President Kruger and he would climb down. I am afraid I cannot acquit the Liberal party from some share of blame in the action we took. My conscience, at any rate, is entirely free from the stain of a single drop of the blood that is being shed in South Africa. I protested last year and the year before last, in season and out of season; but I am afraid some of our Liberal friends did not do as much as they might. They wanted to give the game of "bluff" a chance of succeeding. We were denounced as encouraging the Transvaal in its resistance; but I am glad to say that the Leader of the Opposition put our party completely right on the question of principle, although I should have been glad if it had been followed up more vigorously. Had we done so, I am sure there would never have been war. Not only were we told that President Kruger would give way, but that these Boers were ignorant farmers, who would never be able to hold together against a disciplined army. We were told that after a month in the field they would be wanting to go back to their farms and crops. Moreover, we were told that they had lost all their skill in shooting since game had disappeared; that they could not maintain themselves in the field because they had no commissariat and no transport arrangements. What is the result? They have a transport service which has surprised the world, for instance, in their use of siege guns as field guns that nobody ever dreamt of before. It is one of the complaints made against the Government by their own supporters that the artillery of the Transvaal has outranged our guns. But all these facts were unknown or ignored, in order to egg the country on to war. The war party knew perfectly well that if the people of England and the Members of this House were acquainted with the real state of things, the course of action entered upon by the Colonial Secretary would not have been persisted in. The facts were kept hidden. Sir, my opinion is that the war fever in this country has simply been worked up. Reference has been made to the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury at Manchester, where he said, dealing with the question of inadequate preparations and the charge of his own supporters, that it would have been impossible to get this House, if it had been asked to do so in June or July last, to sanction a vote for the purposes of the war. He omitted to state the real reason. I entirely agree with the First Lord of the Treasury. What he said was perfectly true. He also said that it was most difficult to project themselves back six months, and to the state of feeling that existed then. That is also true; but the real reason for the attitude taken up by the Government in not getting the House to vote for war in July was because the House would at that time have recoiled with horror from the idea of waging war on account of the dynamite monopoly, or on account of this question of franchise. Nobody would have dreamt of it. Therefore, to secure the vote it was necessary to work up the war feeling. That is the secret of the new diplomacy as against the old diplomacy. The difference between the two is that under the old diplomacy the object was to avert war. The object of the new diplomacy is to ensure war, and in order to do that it was necessary to excite popular feeling. That is the reason why Sir Alfred Milner's despatch was instantly published. And so the angry feeling spread on the instant. That underlies the explanation given by the First Lord of the Treasury at Manchester; and Lord Salisbury said practically the same thing in the House of Lords, when attempting to justify this new diplomacy. He said it was necessary in order to carry the country with them. As long as the country remained cool and calm, the disproportion between issues in dispute, and sacrifices, and horrors of war could be kept steadily in view. But once let popular resentment loose, and calm reason and argument vanished. I have only one other question to deal with in the points raised by this debate. There was a taunting laugh when I referred to President Kruger's statement that he would never invade our territory unless we invaded his. I say that he has not broken his promise. It is idle to say that the ultimatum was the cause of the war. As it is put in the excellent words of Lord Crewe: "If the ultimatum made war inevitable, who made the ultimatum inevitable?" What was the actual fact? The members of the Government did not apparently know, for the First Lord of the Admiralty misstated the dates. The actual fact was to be found here: The normal garrison in South Africa was 10,000. Between June and October the normal garrison sprang from 10,000 to 24,700 men; and it was increased with a view of enforcing our demands upon the Transvaal. Nevertheless, President Kruger did not make war. It was on the 29th September last, according to the speech of the Under Secretary of State for War, that the Government came to the decision to send an armed force to South Africa. That decision was immediately announced in the Government organs. The newspapers all stated that a field force was going to be sent to South Africa, and that Parliament was going to be called together in order to vote Supplies. Nevertheless, even then President Kruger did not send an ultimatum. He was asked to take the assurances of certain newspapers. He said—

“I do not care what the newspapers say. I look to the actions of Her Majesty's Government.”

Then on the 7th October came the Royal Proclamation calling this House together to vote those ten millions in order to send out that field force. On the 9th October, two days later, we sent the ultimatum. Now, if the ultimatum caused the war, then the Government must be impaled on the horns of a dilemma. The Government undertook to send out 48,000 troops in addition to those sent out already, to march through our colonies to the frontier of the Transvaal, then, having done that, our ultimatum was to be sent to President Kruger formulating our demands. Then, if President Kruger declined the ultimatum, would we order that army of 75,000 men to the right about and ship them back to England without fighting. It was either that or we meant war. I venture to say that there is not a statesman or military man in the world who would not say that after the decision to send out the Army Corps the Boers had only two alternatives before them—either complete submission or war. No, Sir, this is what I have all along regarded as an unjust and iniquitous war. It is a war waged on behalf of capitalists, and the most unscrupulous set of capitalists that the world has ever seen. That charge has not been met. It has been evaded in the most puerile fashion by Lord Salisbury. He said that “it was suggested they (the Ministers) wanted to put money into their pockets.” We do not suggest that. What we do suggest is that they were the willing dupes of the people in South Africa who wanted to put money into their own pockets. Not only did the capitalists make war, but the press made war, and we are face to face with the consequences, the terrible consequences, in the slaughter of hundreds of lives. Two Anglesey gentlemen, living within a few miles of my house, were among the officers killed in the disaster of Spion Kop. I say, Sir, that it is maddening to think of gallant lives being thus sacrificed, and this horrible war being waged, to play the game of an unscrupulous and greedy gang of capitalists.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON : I listened to the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and I fail to discover any indication in his speech of any sound argument against the policy pursued by Her Majesty's Government. He has found fault with the Government for increasing our armaments, and yet I find that he himself finds fault with Her Majesty's Government for not taking proper precautions before the outbreak of war in South Africa. There is this peculiarity in the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and in the speeches of other Members on that side of the House. They have devoted nearly all their speeches to vilifying their own country. I cannot conceive any accusation brought against a country more unpatriotic than that of accusing one's country of engaging in an utterly unjust war. The difference between the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Aberdeen, whom we listened to to-night, is that the former did not tell us how he is going to vote, or whether he is going to vote at all. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Aberdeen gave us a long dissertation to prove that this country is absolutely unjust in the war now proceeding in South Africa, and yet he concluded by saying that he intended to give his support to the Government in carrying the war on. The right hon. Gentleman led us to believe that as he declared this to be an unjust war he would not support the Government in carrying it on ; but the contrary is the fact. Sir, the speeches to-night struck me as showing that hon. Gentlemen opposite are utterly out of touch with the country. The country does not care a jot for these academic utterances. I could understand these speeches and the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Aberdeen if they had been made last session, but I cannot conceive a man, who calls himself a Briton, making such speeches while the war is going on.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): He's a Celt.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I will attend to you before I am done. I feel, sir, that a great responsibility lies upon this House in regard to the present stage of the history of this country. I do not for a moment believe that the country is in danger; I do not think the country was ever stronger. But it is a grave crisis—a turning point in the history of the country, and, therefore, a serious one. I should have imagined that before putting down what amounts to a vote of want of confidence in the Government—a serious step, and one which is unprecedented in the history of the country—hon. Gentlemen opposite would have considered well their conduct; for I can find no analogous case, when a great war is going on, where Parliament has endeavoured to bring about a vote of want of confidence in the Government.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Chatham and Fox.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: Certainly not in this century.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Fox is in this century.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: They must have thought of the seriousness of the step when they put that vote on the Paper. What does it mean? It means that, if adopted, the Amendment will turn out Her Majesty's Government who are conducting this war, and those gentlemen opposite will step into their places. I have been a Member of this House for the last thirty-five years.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: On the Liberal side.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: That was before the Liberals proposed to sell their country. During the course of these years I have heard many votes of want of confidence raised in this House, but I never remember a vote of want of confidence being proposed against any Government, and supported in the way pursued by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Now, Sir, the issue before the House is of the simplest possible description. There is a great task before the country and before the Government. The Government are carrying out that task to the best of their ability. And the Opposition have put a vote on the Paper which, if carried, will turn the Government out. The House of Commons is invited to cast its eye upon the roll of gentlemen who sit on that side of the table, and those who sit on this side; and it is asked to decide which party is most likely to carry out the task successfully. The peculiarity of the situation is to be found in hon. Gentlemen getting up on that side of the House and saying that they intend to support the Government, while at the same time they seem to desire to turn them out. So when I listened to the very able speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Berwick Division, who spoke last night, I was astonished. I never heard more patriotic sentiments uttered than those of the hon. Baronet. He said it was a perfectly just war, and he was apparently satisfied with the speech made by my hon. friend the Under Secretary of State for War. He said it had relieved him of a great weight, and had satisfied his mind, and that he intended to give the Government all the support in his power, and yet he said that he was going to vote against them. All I can make out is that the hon. Baronet and those with him look upon this Amendment as a sort of tonic administered to Her Majesty's Government, not with a view of turning them out, but by way of stimulating them to further efforts in the discharge of their task. The House is asked to judge between the Front Opposition bench and Her Majesty's Government; and I imagine that the House will take a businesslike view of the situation, and see which set of Gentlemen is likely to see the thing most successfully through. Well, observe what the Government have done. They have succeeded in doing what no other Government in this or any other country have ever done before. In an incredibly short space of time they have landed 160,000 men in South Africa. More than that, the Government intend to carry on the war to a triumphant conclusion. The question is, would the opposite party, if they came into power, carry out that policy? Some of them look upon this as an unjust war; but I ask you to support the Government who are most likely to terminate the struggle with success. If the Amendment is carried the present Government will leave the Treasury Bench; and they will be replaced by right hon. Gentlemen opposite. Then these right hon. Gentlemen who formed the Government would be absolutely dependent for the position they occupied on the Treasury Bench on the votes of hon. Gentlemen opposite. They would be dependent on the votes of eighty Irish Nationalists who sit below the gangway, and I ask you how you could trust a Government so supported to carry out the task? I think, Sir, it is absolutely necessary, before this House, by displacing the present Government, brings about the appointment of such a set of gentlemen to carry on the business of the country, to bear well in mind the results that would follow the administration of such a Government. Now, a very distinguished Member opposite—the hon. Member for Waterford—who I am glad to see to-day—made a speech at a meeting of the Irish Nationalist Members on Tuesday last, which I ask you to consider, because it directly bears on the position of the party supported by the hon. Member. He said, “It was no exaggeration to say that now, for the first time since the Union, the power of England was seriously menaced. Her prestige, which had protected her so long, was at this moment almost shattered—[An HON. MEMBER: Lord Rosebery said so.]—and no man could tell what might arise out of such a situation.” If the Government were changed and if right hon. Gentlemen opposite took the places of the present occupants of the Treasury bench, they would practically be at the mercy of eighty Nationalist votes. I think the House ought to consider whether a Government supported in that manner would be likely to be a Government that would carry out the will of the nation—for it is the will of the nation—to bring this war to its proper conclusion. Distinguished Irishmen on the other side of the channel have also been making remarks in the same direction. A distinguished man in Ireland made the following statement. [An

HON. MEMBER: Who is he?] The Mayor of Limerick. He said—

“The British soldiers are falling before the Boers, and when the Boers have taken the ‘stuffing’ out of them, then the men of Cork and the rest of Ireland will lend a hand.”

When the “stuffing” was taken out of the British soldiers, then the courage of the Irish nation would rise to the proper point. If this motion were carried not only would the British soldiers be attacked in front by the Boers, but also they would be liable to be attacked in the rear, for the Nationalists never attacked in the front. [Several HON. MEMBERS: Withdraw, withdraw!]

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): What about the Tugela? Why are you not at the front with the Cavan Militia?

*MR. SPEAKER: I hope hon. Members will confine their interruptions within proper limits.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask you, Sir, on a point of order, whether the speeches of the Mayor of Limerick are relevant to this Vote?

*MR. SPEAKER: As I understand, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman is showing what would be the consequences of carrying a vote of censure.

MR. DILLON: May I be permitted to point out that the right hon. Gentleman made a grossly insulting observation to Irishmen?

*MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman did not, in my opinion, exceed the limits of Parliamentary language in what he said.

MR. T. B. CURRAN (Donegal, N.): He said that Nationalists were cowards.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Why should he insult Irishmen?

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to say that we are in no humour to stand insults from the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. DILLON: Why don't you go out and fight?

MR. T. M. HEALY: How many Orangemen had Buller with him? You go and insult Butler. Where is the Cavan Militia?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must ask hon. Members to abstain from these disorderly interruptions.

MR. T. M. HEALY: We will be insulted by no one.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: You, Sir, ought to protect us from being insulted. Why should we be insulted here? If I had said anything of the kind I would not have been permitted.

MR. DILLON: Go out and fight the Boers. You are always bragging here of what you will do against us.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): May I ask you, Sir, on a point of order, whether an expression does not exceed the limits of Parliamentary usage when it is to the effect of the one used by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that Nationalists never attack in front?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member asks me a question on a point of order, and his supporters raise a clamour which prevents me from answering. I think it is hardly courteous to the Chair. The hon. Member asks me whether such an expression is out of order.

*MR. SPEAKER: That is the same thing. I say that in my opinion it is not out of order, and I will tell the House why. If the observation had been made in a sense in which it was a personal reflection upon Members of this House or upon their courage, then it would be out of order. But a line must be drawn in considering whether a matter is disorderly or is within the freedom of debate, and I am quite sure that, if hon. Members will reflect, they will admit that they have often used, without being interrupted, language with reference to the English people which is as offensive to the feelings of Englishmen. In so doing, provided they did not make a personal attack upon

Members of this House, they were in order. It may be a question of taste on one side or the other whether such language should be used. I have no control over that. I can only speak on questions of order, and to the best of my ability I decide them with perfect impartiality from whichever side of the House they may come. I am doing so in the present instance, and I hope hon. Members will give me credit for doing so, and will pay some attention to my ruling.

SEVERAL HON. MEMBERS: Withdraw withdraw!

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I will withdraw. When the expression escaped my lips I did not mean to insult hon. Gentlemen opposite. I am an Irishman myself, and I am as proud as they are of Irish valour, and when I used the expression I was simply thinking of historical records in Ireland, which I thought justified me in saying what I did. I wish to withdraw it.

MR. DILLON: That is making the observation twice as bad. Withdraw it like a gentleman.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: This will be nice reading at Pretoria for Kruger.

MR. DILLON: Three times as many of our men have been killed at the front as of Englishmen. It is an insulting observation. It is a most cowardly and insulting observation.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is hardly going the right way, it seems to me, to obtain anything like an expression of regret from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite when he charges him with being cowardly.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Why don't you ask him to withdraw?

AN HON. MEMBER: Name, name!

MR. DILLON: Mr. Speaker, we are Irish Nationalists, and when the right hon. Gentleman used the expression he used, we were justified in applying it to ourselves, and we did apply it to ourselves, and we regard it as a gross reflection upon every Member who sits upon these benches. And when the right hon. Gentleman stood up to make some sort of apology or withdrawal, what is the explanation he offered us? Why, that he had in mind the records of our race and that he based his reflections upon those records. I say nothing could be more insulting.

SEVERAL HON. MEMBERS: Withdraw, withdraw!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: May I venture, very respectfully, if I am not out of order, Mr. Speaker, to appeal to both sides of the House, to my right hon. and gallant friend as well as to Gentlemen opposite, to allow a controversy to drop as to an observation which really was not intended to be offensive.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): Let him speak for himself.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Send him to the House of Peers; we have had enough of him.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: The Leader of the House is a gentleman, and would not use such language.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Oh, yes, he is a gentleman.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have been, in my time, severely attacked myself by hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: We never insulted you.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have said hard things of them —

MR. DILLON: You never called us cowards.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: And I am glad to think it has not interfered with our good relations. My right hon. and gallant friend has explained that he did not intend anything offensive to hon. Gentlemen opposite, and, therefore, not in the interests of my right hon. and gallant friend or of any section of the House, but in the general interest, I appeal to hon. Members to allow the incident to end.

*MR. SPEAKER: I am sure that when the right hon. and gallant Gentleman is told that what he said is understood by hon. Gentlemen on the other side to apply to them personally he will withdraw it.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: Certainly, Sir; I withdraw the observation.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I hope the Irish soldiers in South Africa will read what you said of them.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I would only point out to the House that a Government supported by hon. Gentlemen opposite would not be likely to carry on the war at present being waged or any other affair connected with the welfare of the Empire in a satisfactory manner, and therefore I say that when the House of Commons decides what set of men shall administer the affairs of the country they will decide by an overwhelming majority upon the present Government as preferable to a Government which would have to depend for support on hon. Gentlemen opposite. Now I ask myself the question what object right hon. Gentlemen opposite have in putting this motion on the Paper? They say they do not want to weaken the Government; then why was the motion put on the Paper? The speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for the Berwick Division could have been made on the main question, and I cannot conceive how a man like the hon. Baronet can bring himself to vote for this Amendment after having made the speech he did last night. That is beyond my comprehension. Now we come to the question of the justice of this war. I believe the British people desire to be perfectly clear in their conscience as to its justice. I am not misinterpreting the opinion of hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House when I say that never in the history of this country has a more just and honourable war been engaged in. What is it that has brought on this war? And now I may say that I do not hold Her Majesty's Government as altogether blameless. What I blame the Government and the preceding Government for is that they allowed the Transvaal to increase its armaments without any sufficient protest. We know on high authority that the responsibility has been cast on the framers of the treaties of 1881 and 1884, but you cannot shuffle off responsibility in that way. That is exactly the way we were treated—perhaps that is why I dislike it so much—when we tried to effect some alteration in the Land Bill. We were told that it was our duty to carry it to its logical conclusion, but that was not an argument that went home to the minds of the Irish landlords. Now we are told that the responsibility rests with the framers of the treaties of 1881 and 1884, because in those treaties no mention was made of armaments in the Transvaal. I do not think that that is an argument which justifies the action of this Government or the Government which preceded it. I believe the duty of a Government, if they find that a mistake had been made by their predecessors, is to remedy it. Everybody knew that these armaments were being collected. The First Lord of the Treasury tells us that the Government were hampered in their action by the raid, but a really big man is never interfered with in doing what he thinks is right by considerations of that kind. The raid was universally condemned in this House and in the country, and I never heard or read of one word having been said or written which would lead to the idea that the raid was not absolutely condemned. It was condemned by the British people, but President Kruger, who is an extremely wise man, made use of it to multiply the armaments of the Transvaal. How did he do it? It is a favourite statement on the other side of the House that this war was caused by the gold interest in South Africa. It is perfectly true that gold brought the war about—and in this way. Had gold not been discovered in South Africa the Boers would not have been able to arm themselves; but when this immense gold field was discovered, to what use did the Boers put it? Two uses. First of all they feathered their own nests, and in the second place they turned the Transvaal into the greatest military power in South Africa. Anyone who has carefully followed the history of our dealings with the Transvaal during the last few years must deeply regret that when millions were being spent on Creusot guns and ammunition of all kinds we had not a Government with the courage to say: "These armaments must cease." That is really the cause of the present war. It has not been brought about by the malice or ingenuity of the British Government. I do not believe any man in Great Britain or in the Empire covets an acre of the Transvaal. It is said we want the gold fields, but what use would the gold fields be to the British people? How would any particle of the gold find its way into the pocket of the British taxpayer? Hon. Gentlemen opposite are quite shrewd enough to know that a great deal of the gold interest in South Africa belongs to foreign countries. I believe that there are thirty millions of French money and forty millions of German money invested in the Rand, and I cannot imagine how hon. Gentlemen can use an argument of such a clap-trap description when they state that we are eager to get the goldfields. That certainly is not an argument that will appeal to the British people. I only wish the Government had followed the example of President Kruger. It will be in the recollection of the House, because it happened only a very few years ago, that President Kruger asked for an explanation from the British Government regarding some small increase in our armaments in South Africa, and the Government responded. I deeply regret that the Government did not follow the wise example of President Kruger, and demand an explanation as to why the Transvaal armaments were being increased, and use all the power of the British Empire to put a stop to them, because they could only end in war. When I visited the Transvaal I made all the inquiries I could regarding its armaments, and it appears that our Government were perfectly well aware of them. What were these armaments for? Were they for the purpose of repelling another raid by three or four hundred Rhodesian policemen? Why, Sir, it was patent to the world that these armaments, paid for by the gold of the Uitlanders, were directed against the British Empire. When I was in South Africa I did not take very long to find out that war was inevitable. I found the Transvaal armed to the teeth, and its armaments could only have been collected in contemplation of war with this country. I found further that there was an organisation—though it may not be called a conspiracy—with its headquarters in Pretoria, and its agents all over Cape Colony paid by the Transvaal. That was the Afrikander Bond, which had for its object the establishment of a Dutch nation throughout South Africa.

Colonel Sanderson.

That cannot be denied. The Bond obtained money from the Transvaal and that money was used to return members to the Cape Legislature. Every British man in South Africa, in common with many Nationalist Irishmen in that country, who are as loyal to the Empire as myself, and who I am glad to see have condemned the action of hon. Gentlemen opposite, knew that these efforts on the part of the Transvaal and the arming of the Free State and the Dutch in our own colony could have only one object—to drive the British out of South Africa. We had only two alternatives—either to force the supremacy of the Crown to be admitted or to scuttle out of the country. It is said that we have gone to war on behalf of the Uitlanders. I do not believe it. The treatment of the Uitlanders was unbearable. We created the Dutch Republic, and the Uitlanders had as much right to be in the country as the Boers themselves, and to be treated on an equality with other white men, but when they were treated as helots, subject to taxation without representation, then the Government, if the supremacy of the Crown meant anything had a right to interfere. The Uitlanders' grievances were the pivot round which the supremacy of the Crown in South Africa turned, and accordingly the Government determined to enforce the supremacy of the Crown, and in doing that they are backed by the British people. It appears to me that some hon. Gentlemen in this House are out of touch with the British people in this matter. Two nights ago after having listened to speeches from the opposite side of the House which tried to show that the British people were engaged in an unjust war, I went to a London railway station and there I saw a train full of young Yeomen who had left their occupations, and were going to Liverpool to embark for South Africa. There was a crowd on the platform cheering them, and I compared what I witnessed with what I had heard in this House.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Why do you not go out yourself?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: The hon. Gentleman asks me why I do not go out myself. Unfortunately I am suffering from an incurable disease—Anno Domini—and I am afraid that after a man has passed the age of sixty he is not allowed to volunteer.

MR. T. M. HEALY: How old is Roberts?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: Oh! if Her Majesty would make me a field-marshal, possibly I might go; but I am afraid that as a Volunteer my age is a barrier. The hon. Member for East Clare professes great admiration for the Boers as well as a considerable dislike for the British Empire. He is at present in the flower of his age. Why does he not go out to the Transvaal?

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I would go to the Transvaal with pleasure, only I feel that I can serve the cause of the Boers and liberty a great deal better here in this House.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: After that remark, I think the House will see it would not be very safe to have a Government dependent on hon. Gentlemen opposite, but I think I can promise the hon. Gentleman and any hon. Member opposite not debarred by age, that if they have any inclination to go to the Transvaal, the Government will not offer any opposition whatever to their going. They will get every facility for going, however it may be as regards their coming back. We are about to decide whether Her Majesty's Government are more likely to carry this war to a successful termination than a Government dependent on the assistance of hon. Gentlemen opposite. I should not like to insult the House of Commons by imagining that it would decide in any other way than by rejecting the Amendment. It is said that this war, even if carried to a successful termination, will be disastrous to South Africa, and will leave in the minds of the Dutch a feeling of racial hatred which time will not obliterate. I do not believe it. I believe the Dutch in South Africa made two mistakes. They adopted two false standards: they measured the pluck and endurance of the British soldier by the Majuba standard, and they measured the determination of the Government of this country and of the British people by the Gladstone standard. They have found that both these standards were fallacious. However this war may end, the Boer soldier and the British soldier—whether he be Irish, English, or Scotch—have learned to respect each other's valour. Neither side will be able to pour contempt on the other. No man admires the courage and war genius of the Boers more than I do, and the Boers themselves will admit that they never met a more courageous antagonist than the British soldier. I look with confidence to the time when, after the war is over, Briton and Boer, thus respecting each other, will live in peace together in South Africa, and when the Boers will realise, as other nationalities have realised, that under the British flag they are sure to enjoy what other people living under that flag enjoy—both freedom and liberty.

*MR. BIRRELL (Fife, W.): The right hon. Gentleman who has just concluded the most repulsive speech which I, at all events, have ever heard in this House began by calling down the vials of his wrath upon my right hon. friend the Member for South Aberdeen for vilifying his country, but he had not been speaking many minutes before a scene arose painful to witness, and at a time like this disgraceful to contemplate. Whose fault was that? What are we to say of the good feeling and patriotism of the man who, at a time like this, knowing well the inflammable material of which he himself is composed, and with which he has to deal, deliberately goes out of his way to pour insults upon his countrymen? For my part I rise with considerable reluctance to take part in this debate, which in my judgment is already too protracted. But I ask myself why it has been so protracted. I do not think that the rank and file of the House ought to bear the blame for that. It is due to the vanity and conceit of the members of the front benches, who cannot make up their minds when they are to speak, who nourish the delusion that Her Majesty called this House together to hear them talk, and who positively regard every Parliamentary day as epicures look upon a joint which has only two or three prime cuts, and unless they can have one of these they will not speak at all. The other hours of the day they treat as offal, on which the rank and file may please themselves by spending their time until the moment arrives for another prime cut off the joint. This course is making our debates both uninteresting and depressing. I can see no reason why the Colonial Secretary should not have spoken to-night or last night, and I do not know why the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Monmouth conceals himself in this debate until the hour has arrived for the delivery of some marvellous oration. I should like to see the leaders listening to the debates, and actively contributing to bring them to a proper conclusion. Then debate would be conducted as it ought to be conducted in the interests of the House and the country. However, these great men have not yet polished their tu quoque, and we must be content to occupy time until they are ready, and I do not know that I have not as much right to occupy this time—to feed upon this offal—as anyone else. I must say, however, that to a private Member like myself, guiltless of my country's blood, and anxious only for the well-being and well-doing of my country, in whose future fortunes some at all events of the best hopes of humanity are, in my opinion, involved and bound up, the course of this debate has been somewhat depressing. I know, of course, we have no right to expect—certainly we have no power to insist—that the best interests of the country shall at all times be served in the Council Chamber by statesmen of wisdom and foresight, and richly endowed with that political imagination without which there can be no wisdom or foresight. Nor can we expect that our generals shall always exhibit military skill in the field. The only working definition of a statesman that I have been able to devise is a politician with a salary. And, as for our soldiers, unfortunately there seems to be nothing in our military experience and training to enable even an expert like Lord Wolseley to select those generals likely to exhibit in the field the highest qualities of military skill. We must take what we can get, and if our generals do not run away, and if our salaried politicians do not take bribes, that is all we can expect. Nevertheless, it was somewhat depressing to be told by the Under Secretary for War in his speech—on which I would gladly lavish praise if praise of mine were worth having, or if he cared to be praised in a crisis like this, for mere oratorical skill—of what he honestly called the disastrous events in South Africa. Our great army, which was to advance in triumph to Pretoria, is now cut up into three hopeless and helpless sections; a large body of men are shut up in a place which, from a military point of view, is not worth the life of a single mule; and thousands of our soldiers are now living in the capital of the foe, fed by the bounty—the generous bounty—of the enemy. I should like to be told that these disastrous events were due to some attributable cause. But they were not. There was no lack of anything. The Intelligence Department told the Government everything; there was no lack of money—the Treasury gave all it was asked for; there was no lack of men, aye, there was no lack of anything—except brains. That is in itself somewhat depressing, and we naturally cannot but criticise those whose hard luck it is to accept the whole responsibility for this matter—and a grave and serious matter it is. I am not blaming Her Majesty's Ministers, but the whole history of our connection with South Africa is one long commentary, often written in blood, upon the melancholy saying, "With how little wisdom the world is governed." I quite agree with one criticism passed by the First Lord of the Treasury on the wording of this Amendment. He asked why only from 1895. If you want even-handed justice you must devise a resolution which will condemn the lack of political imagination of every Colonial Secretary who has held the seals of office during the present century. But what is it we find fault with to-day? Why the man and even the boy in the street know it. What is the offence urged against the Government? It is twofold. There was the delusion that President Kruger would not fight, and the neglect to give proper protection to our Colony of Natal. Why were Ministers persuaded that President Kruger would not fight? Who told them that lie? Who disseminated that dishonouring suspicion? I have no doubt—though I cannot prove it—that it could be traced to the fons et origo mali in this case—Mr. Rhodes. He has said over and over again that the bravery of the Boers was an unpricked bubble, and that they would not fight. Mr. Rhodes is the very last man whose opinion I would take on any subject involving the nobler aspects of humanity. He has so long worshipped the power of money—I will not say money for personal purposes—that he firmly believes every man has his price, and that he can have a cash deal with any man. He thinks no more of buying a newspaper—editor; staff, and all—than a schoolboy thinks of buying an orange. This was not the man whose opinion was worth listening to for a moment, as to whether these burghers would or would not fight. Why should they not fight? We are told that their Government was oligarchy. Great heavens! men do not fight for governments. Do you suppose that the brave men who have fallen in the service of the Crown in South Africa died with the name of "Chamberlain" on their lips? The very thought is impious. Do you suppose the Boers who have died laid down their lives for the dynamite monopoly? As for the Boer Government being an oligarchy, I wonder when did an oligarchy become so distasteful to the great Tory party. When was our great Empire founded? It was founded in the eighteenth century, and the Government of that time was an oligarchy, and when I add that it was a Whig oligarchy there is no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that it was as corrupt as Satan. Nevertheless, our soldiers died and cemented with their blood that Empire which they founded and we talk about. There was no reason why the Boers should not fight for what they believed to be their independence. I do not believe there is a man in this House—and all men are willing to be fair to an enemy—who does not believe that President Kruger and his burghers had grave grounds for the suspicion—if not for the belief—that there were in South Africa powerful, influential, wealthy and unscrupulous men, who were aided, supported and sympathised with by powerful and wealthy men in this country, who would never be content until these two Republics which stood between them and their dreams—I do not say disgraceful dreams at all—were swept away. President Kruger and his burghers had grounds for that suspicion, and therefore it cannot be denied that in their own opinion they are fighting for their independence. Whether these men are heroes or not is a question I will not discuss, but history is full of examples in which such men were always supposed to be heroes. It was therefore as natural and reasonable a thing for any rational man to imagine that the Boers would fight as anything else that was likely to happen in the area of political conflict. I think it is a wise and patriotic thing to put ourselves as far as we can in our enemy's place and give him as much credit as we can for generosity. We should hold the balance evenly, even when our own country is in the scale. But I confess that if I thought-- as some hon. Members not confined to one side of the House think-- that Her Majesty's Ministers had goaded and provoked President Kruger into this war and had made themselves the puppets of Mr. Rhodes and his bulls and bears, I should not be content myself with voting for this insignificant Amendment. I should think it my duty to use every energy I could command, every force I possessed, to stop this war at once. I would do my utmost to have a proper message sent to the presidents of the two Republics saying that if they withdrew their troops from the Queen's dominions we would pay the whole expenses of such an unjust war. But thank God I do not believe anything of the kind. I am persuaded that, whatever the faults, shortcomings, and lack of political imagination, and of all the other great qualities—with which, of course, everyone else is endowed—of Lord Salisbury's Cabinet, it was a Cabinet of peace. I believe it wanted to keep the peace, and although I do not blame President Kruger for entertaining a contrary opinion, I cannot give over my country because another man had some justification for making a mistake. President Kruger could if he liked have had peace with that independence guaranteed to him under the Convention. If he were a genuine lover of peace, if he were studiously anxious to do as much justice to persons carrying on industries within his dominions as he ought to have been, whether we had a right to interfere or not, he could have appealed over the head of Mr. Rhodes, over the head of the Colonial Secretary, even over the head of Lord Salisbury, if it were necessary, which it was not, to the British people, who, whatever their faults—and they have great and even hideous faults if you like—are a generous people, who had no desire to make war on a small republic which they believed at that time was not so well equipped to meet them as it has since proved itself to be. Had he done this, war by us upon him would have been impossible, and war by him upon us unnecessary. I do not believe that anyone has any other feeling than one of horror when they read of the deaths of the Boers; after we have shed our tears over our own killed and wounded, I do not think anyone can read of the sacrifice of life among these brave men without shedding tears of bitter vexation. This war was not, however, desired by the Government or the people of this country, and I think also that the House of Commons is free from any such imputation. We on this side are justified in maintaining two things: one, that we did not begin this war, the necessity for which President Kruger might have prevented, and the other that the war must be carried to its legitimate conclusion. If we can do it, we must; if we cannot, we must submit. The legitimate conclusion of this war is to render a repetition of such a conflict an impossibility. Secure that by any means you like, and I at all events shall be satisfied. When I made use of certain language in Manchester, which has been referred to, and to which I adhere, I was not speaking of any permanent Government or anything of that kind. I meant that the war should be proceeded with until a repetition of it became an impossibility, and it is for Statesmen to consider how best that can be done. If it is not done every life lost in war and every pound spent on war is a life squandered and a pound thrown away. I do not intend to occupy the time of the House longer, and I only wish that the division on this Amendment had been taken at an hour which would have prevented me from making any observations at all.

It being midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—MESSAGE FROM MAFEKING.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to move that the House do now adjourn, and, in making that motion, perhaps I may be permitted by the House to say that I have received from Sir Arthur Bigge, by her Majesty's command, a telegram which she thinks may interest the House. It is from the Mayor of Mafeking, and is dated January 27. The message begins:—

"Mafeking, upon the hundredth day of the siege, sends loyal devotion to your Majesty, and an assurance of the continued resolve to maintain your Majesty's supremacy in this town.—WHITELEY, Mayor."

Adjourned at one minute after Twelve of the clock till Monday next.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—CONTEMPLATED MILITARY MEASURES.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, I rise to move to resolve—

“That in the opinion of this House a full statement as to the military measures which Her Majesty’s Government have in contemplation is desirable at the earliest possible moment.”

I rise really to ask a question of my noble friend the Secretary of State for War, but as I was anxious to make one or two observations upon that question I thought it would be more in order to put it on the notice paper in the form of a motion. I feel sure that the terms of the motion, that a statement from Her Majesty’s Government in respect of military preparations is desirable at the present moment, will be acceptable to every member of the House, but it may appear unnecessary. That I do not dispute; and lest it should seem to imply that I attribute any reluctance to my noble friend the Secretary of State to impart that information, I wish to say at once, and emphatically, that such is not the case. Your Lordships will recollect that on Tuesday last my noble friend said, in answer to the noble Earl, Lord Rosebery, and, I think, the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition, that he would at a very early date explain fully what measures Her Majesty’s Government have in contemplation. A week has elapsed, all but a day, and though under ordinary circumstances a week is not a very important lapse of time, yet a week of silence in the present condition of tension of the national mind causes anxiety, and is hard to bear. I therefore hope that the noble Marquess will presently inform the House of the date, or, at any rate, the approximate date when he proposes to make his promised statement, and I venture to urge that it should be made with the least possible delay. The question of how the drain upon the normal military resources of the country is to be made good, how sufficient reinforcements can be sent to the seat of war, and how the defensive strength of the country is to be raised to the requirements of any eventuality, is the one matter upon which the nation demands, and naturally and properly demands, information. One remark that fell on Tuesday last from my noble friend the Secretary of State caused me some little uneasiness. He said he did not consider the debate on the Address a suitable occasion to make a full statement "on a very technical matter." I would suggest that great detail is, at any rate in the first instance, unnecessary in the statement so anxiously looked for, and if a very technical explanation involves delay it is to be deprecated. Great technicalities and very elaborate statements of detail are apt to obscure the main facts, and what the constantly-quoted "man in the street" wants to know at once is what steps Her Majesty's Government are going to take to render effective the potential strength of the nation, with a view not only to the determined prosecution of the war, to the only settlement with which the nation will be satisfied, but also to preparedness against, I won't say the probability, because I believe there is no probability, but the merest possibility of the occurrence of any unforeseen event that might render still more grave the very grave and serious position in which the Empire is placed. In South Africa disaster—and I do not hesitate to say that up to the present the campaign has been disastrous—may be traced, in almost every case, to one cause—lack of sufficient strength. What is the result? Our forces are everywhere stalemated, and they have been asked to perform, and to their enduring renown they have performed, tasks which, even allowing for the magnificent courage and splendid fighting qualities they have displayed, were, according to the ordinary rules and arithmetic of warfare, disproportionate to their strength. We want to know that sufficient troops will be sent out to satisfy the now proved requirements of the case. We want to feel, in addition to that, that the Government are taking timely steps to provide against any possible emergency, however remote, that may add difficulties to an already difficult task. We want to feel that the strength of the nation will be utilised. There is a fund of strength—not inexhaustible but well-nigh inexhaustible—a fund of strength, moral and physical, in the nation upon which the Government may safely draw. They can rely upon it their drafts will not be dishonoured. The fund is waiting to be drawn upon, anxious to be drawn upon; but to be utilised effectively it must be drawn upon in time. It is idle to try and disguise the fact that, justly or unjustly, the Government are thought to have been afflicted with defective vision, to have been all along troubled with a false sense of proportion and perspective, and it is unwise to ignore that an uneasy feeling exists that even now they do not fully realise the gravity of the situation. That feeling, however erroneous, should be dispelled. I may be told that even if Her Majesty's Government did minimise the situation in the past, it would be equally foolish to exaggerate it now. I do not think that is so. Neither Parliament nor the people will, I am convinced, quarrel with the Government for taking measures which may happily prove to be far in excess of anything that the future shows to have been necessary. I feel very sure that any measures that the Government think fit to take, however widely they may depart from ordinary custom and usage, will be welcomed, provided they are designed to place the nation in such a position that its utmost strength, whether for offence or defence, can, if necessary, be exhibited. That, I believe, is the one matter which exercises the public mind. People look with indifference if not with contempt upon speeches out of doors and debates in Parliament dealing with the past. Accusations and vindications appear to them very trivial matters now. Their attention is riveted upon the future. What they want to know and to feel is the certainty that Her Majesty's Government will take, and will promptly take, whatever steps are necessary to place the nation in such a position that its undeveloped strength can be developed, so that it may be able to prosecute the war vigorously to a conclusion, and, if necessary, defend itself under any circumstances which could possibly arise. Feeling strongly as I do on this subject, I venture to think that it is very desirable that a general statement, if not a full and detailed statement, of the steps which Her Majesty's Government intend to take, should be made known to Parliament and the country as speedily as possible.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE):

My Lords, nothing is further from my thoughts than to blame my noble friend for the desire he has expressed to be furnished as soon as possible with a statement of our intentions, and I have certainly no wish to postpone needlessly the moment at which his desire may be gratified. But I am told that it is customary and convenient that statements of such a description should be made simultaneously in both Houses of Parliament. The House of Commons at this moment is still occupied in discussing the terms of the Address in reply to the gracious Speech from the Throne, and the general impression is that that discussion is very likely to last for some days to come. I am told that this obstacle—the only obstacle—is likely to disappear, probably within the limit of a week from the present date; and I can therefore intimate that as the approximate time at which I shall be able to make a statement to your Lordships. I gladly notice what fell from my noble friend when he said that he had no desire to press for a minute statement of the details of our scheme, and that what he desired to obtain from us was a general outline of the proposals which we had in contemplation. Meanwhile, I may perhaps be allowed to administer a grain of comfort to my noble friend by telling him that the postponement of the statement will not, in my belief, occasion any delay in the preparation of the measures themselves, because we are taking it for granted that the country desires that such measures should be adopted, and we are proceeding on that assumption and losing no time. All I think that I can usefully add this evening is that I entirely accept what was said by my noble friend as to the double duty which is incumbent upon us—the duty, I mean, of making adequate preparations for the prosecution of the war in South Africa, and also for the securing of the safety of these islands during the period when they must necessarily be denuded of a large portion of the forces which are habitually stationed within the limits of the country. I hope I shall be able to show your Lordships that we see our way to provide for both those objects, and I may certainly repeat, what has already been said on much higher authority than mine, that, having addressed ourselves to this task, we mean to carry it through, if I may use his words, “to the only conclusion which will be satisfactory to the people of this country.”

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: With the permission of the House I withdraw my motion.

THE IRREGULAR CORPS.—COL. EDIS AND THE INSPECTOR-GENERAL OF AUXILIARY FORCES.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, I rise to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to letters which have appeared in the public press from Colonel Edis; and whether the Inspector-General of Auxiliary Forces has control over the various irregular corps now being formed. I have no intention of going into the question as to whether the letter ought or ought not to have been published, nor do I propose to enter into the subject-matter of the letter in any detail; but I should like some information on one point. The main complaint in the letter of Colonel Edis is that the Volunteer Corps are not allowed to recruit beyond their normal strength. I understand from an answer to a question given by the Under Secretary of State in another place that the Volunteer Battalions may be recruited beyond their normal paper strength to the amount of drafts which have been sent out to the seat of the war; but to limit any increase in these battalions beyond the normal strength to that amount does not appear to me to be a common-sense proceeding. The Volunteer force is, of course, a defensive force, and its great value is probably brought home to us more forcibly now, when the country is denuded to so very great an extent of the ordinary garrison than it has been before. I contend that if the Volunteer force is to be kept up to its true value as a defensive force it must be kept up to its full strength. To do that it is not sufficient to merely allow recruiting to the extent only of the drafts sent out to the seat of war. Commanding officers should be allowed to recruit to a considerable margin above their normal strength, not only to the amount of drafts which have gone out to the war, but also to make allowance for further drafts which may have to go out, and for the ordinary waste and wear of war. By that means only can these Volunteer Battalions be kept up to their proper strength. In an emergency like the present, when it is necessary that the raw material of defence in the country should be turned into a more or less manufactured article as speedily as possible, I should have thought that there could have been no serious objection to allowing battalions numerically small to be recruited up to, at any rate, the normal strength of a line battalion, and I would venture to express the hope that the Army Order dealing with this matter may be interpreted a little more liberally. I have no doubt that my noble friend the Secretary of State for War knows as well as I do, and perhaps a great deal better than I do, that a certain amount of dissatisfaction exists in the country owing to the obstructions which are being placed in the way of the Volunteer movement. I am not going to inquire how far that is justified, but my own impression is that there is a considerable foundation in fact for the existence of this feeling. It seems to me perfectly inevitable that in a sudden and hurried movement of this kind difficulties and friction must arise. The wonder is that the friction is not greater. I have seen it stated in the papers, with what truth I do not know, that units have been disbanded because they were kept waiting so long that they did not know whether they would be utilised or not. Complaints have also been made as to the rejection, at the final medical examination, of men who have previously been passed by properly qualified medical officers. I would venture to remind my noble friend that in the matter of medical examination, for instance, there is a very great difference between the recruiting for the Regular Army and recruiting for the Special Corps. In the former case the medical men have to consider whether the recruit is likely, in the course of years, to become a charge on the country. I scarcely think that the Army Order dealing with the matter is sufficiently elastic. In my opinion, commanding officers and medical men ought to be given considerable latitude in the question of age, and some latitude in the question of dimensions. Many men considerably over the Government limit of age for the Regular Army, and perhaps not quite up to the proper standard of chest measurement and height, may be admirably adapted for the services required of them at present. I am not sure whether, in an emergency of this kind, it would not be advisable in this special corps to relax the sight test, and to accept men who are short sighted, but whose sight is otherwise sound. There are one or two other matters which I should like to mention merely as examples of the difficulties that arise. Take the matter, for instance, of equipment. It is essential that all these special corps should be armed with Government rifles, but, with regard to the carrying of ammunition, if any particular corps favoured some other method, such as the Boer waiscoat, in preference to the Government bandolier, why should they not be allowed to adopt it? Many of these men are crack shots possessing their own rifles, and surely in such cases they ought to be encouraged to bring them, because they naturally suit the individual idiosyncrasies of the owners. There ought to be some authority dealing with these questions who could say "yes" or "no," and could thereby settle points of doubt. If I am asked by a man whether any allowance will be given if he brings his own rifle I cannot give him an answer. If I write to the War Office I may, in the course of time, get an answer on several cubic feet of foolscap paper, but considerable time will be wasted. I would venture to suggest that some authority should be created, if it does not at present exist, and should be instructed to push forward as much as possible the volunteering desire of the people, and to give considerable latitude in small matters of detail. This authority should be able to give authoritative answers to questions of the kind to which I have referred. I am sure my noble friend is most anxious to clear away anything which can possibly constitute a difficulty in the way of the volunteering spirit of the nation, which is so much to be commended, and I would appeal to him to take into consideration the small points I have mentioned, and devise some means whereby they can be obviated in the future.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE :
My Lords, I think I ought first to state to my noble friend with regard to the corps which he describes as "the various irregular corps now being raised," and by which I think he means the Imperial Yeomanry and the Volunteer companies lately attached to the line battalions, that the members of those corps are treated as belonging to the regular Army. They are formally enlisted in the regular Army, and from the moment that they join the companies of Volunteers or the Mounted Infantry they pass under the administrative control of the same members of the Headquarters Staff as the regular Army. They are, therefore, no longer under the Inspector-General of Auxiliary Forces, as they would be as long as they remained Volunteers pure and simple. As to the letter published in the papers with Colonel Edis's signature, Colonel Edis wrote to the War Office, his communication being received on December 25th, asking permission to raise two new companies for his Volunteer battalion. The answer which Colonel Edis received was this—that his battalion having provided a company which had been transferred to the line battalion, he was at liberty to go on recruiting to an extent sufficient to fill the vacancies thus occasioned. That was equivalent to telling him that the company attached to the line battalion was to be treated as supernumerary, and that his own battalion was not to suffer by the transference. But as to the further question, whether Colonel Edis should be at liberty to go on recruiting so as not only to add to his battalion sufficient men to make up the void, but also to raise further companies, permission to do that was not given at that time. It is quite clear that it would have been impossible to give a permission of that kind to one Volunteer colonel and not to others. The question was one of great importance, affecting the whole of the Volunteer force, and it was a question which, I think, we might not unfairly desire to reserve for examination. Colonel Edis did not wait for the answer to his letter; but, assuming that the answer would be in the affirmative, he proceeded to raise recruits for his battalion; and that, to put it mildly, was a little previous. If other Volunteer colonels had proceeded in the same manner, comment might have been made upon the ideas of the Volunteer force in regard to what is, after all, a matter of military discipline. I think it is to be regretted that Colonel Edis took that course; and, having taken it and put himself in the wrong, that he should have written a letter imputing to the military authorities feelings with regard to the Volunteer force which they are very far indeed from entertaining. But, my Lords, I certainly do not dispute what my noble friend has said as to the desirability of taking advantage at a moment like the present of as many as possible of those spontaneous offers of military service which are reaching us from so many parts of the country. We have been considering that matter, and it is one which I will deal with when I have the honour of addressing the House as to the military steps which we intend to take. But I have not the slightest objection to telling the noble Earl now that our idea is this. All Volunteer battalions should be allowed to recruit up to a certain maximum strength, even if that maximum considerably exceeds the present authorised establishment. Of course, if you go beyond about 1,000 men, you get a unit which becomes too large and is inconvenient for military purposes. But where the influx of recruits is so great as to point to the conclusion that recruits might be obtained sufficient not only to raise the battalion to its maximum strength but also higher still, then we shall have no objection whatever to substituting for one full-size battalion two other battalions which might perhaps be of a somewhat inferior numerical strength. That is a perfectly fair way of meeting the desire which has been expressed. My noble friend spoke of the action of the War Office in rejecting men who had accepted a liability for service with these new Volunteer companies, on the ground that they did not come up to the physical standard insisted upon for the Regulars.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: Men who had previously been passed.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I fancy I am familiar with the case to which my noble friend refers. It was a case in which the colonel of a battalion raised a company and had the men examined on his own responsibility. He had not complied with the terms of the Army Order, which says that—

“When a Volunteer commanding officer has received application for not less than a section of Volunteers, he will so inform the officer commanding the regimental dépôt to which his battalion is affiliated, who will then, if they are to form part of the service company, have them medically inspected, and, if fit for service, attested.”

But in this case the medical examination was not conducted in the proper way, but, I believe, by some private practitioner, and without communicating with the officer of the dépôt. The company was subsequently examined in the proper way, and it was found that forty-seven of the men did not come up to the proper standards of height or chest measurement. My noble friend's observation upon that is that our regulations should be more elastic. But I ask the House to consider whether, in the case of these Volunteer companies—who are to serve with Regular battalions in South Africa, under conditions just as trying as those endured by the soldiers who have been fighting for us during the past weeks—it would be fair to the men themselves or to the officers who command them to send out from this country Volunteers who, in point of physical stamina, are distinctly inferior to the regular soldiers by whose side they are to stand in the field. We considered this matter, and we thought that it would be most inexpedient to relax the conditions on which we insist in the case of ordinary recruiting; and I hold strongly that, in cases of this kind, the exercise of a kind of dispensing power by the Secretary of State is most inexpedient. You should lay down what your best advisers tell you is a reasonable standard, and you should tell your medical advisers to ascertain whether that standard is reached, and not to accept men falling below it. But, my Lords, while we insisted on this measure of strictness with regard to these Volunteer companies, I am glad to tell my noble friend that in the case of the Imperial Yeomanry, who will be serving under somewhat less trying conditions, we did in our instructions dwell especially on the fact that these men would be required, not to serve for a term of seven or twelve years with the colours, like the ordinary soldiers, but for one year or for the duration of the war; and we said that they should be judged with reference to that condition. My noble friend is anxious that some authority should be appointed who will be able to answer questions on subjects of this kind. I believe that authority can be discovered without very much difficulty. It depends what the particular point is, but all these questions are allocated to the different members of the headquarters staff, and if there is any delay in dealing with them it is probably owing to the great pressure of work. I may mention in this connection, as evidence of our desire to meet the wishes of these newly raised corps in every possible way, that we have, in regard to the Imperial Yeomanry, been very much guided by a committee of Yeomanry officers, who have been constantly sitting, and who have acted as a valuable intermediary between the War Office and the corps. This committee have been able to take off our hands a number of those very details which the noble Lord wishes to see dealt with by methods somewhat more elastic than those habitual in a public department. As to the question whether, if a Volunteer brought his own rifle he would be allowed to substitute it for the weapon with which otherwise the Government would supply him, the first consideration would be whether the rifle was the same as that issued to the remainder of the corps. Of course, if it necessitated the supply of different ammunition it would be out of the question.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: But if not, could he be granted some allowance?

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I have not heard the suggestion made before, but I am willing to take it into consideration.

LORD MONKSWELL: There was one point in the speech of the noble Marquess which I did not understand. The noble Marquess said that a different standard would be adopted for the Imperial Yeomanry as compared with the Volunteers serving with the Army. The noble Marquess put the difference upon the ground that the Yeomanry only served for a year or till the end of the war. Is it not the same with regard to the Volunteers?

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: The Volunteer company becomes a company of the line battalion, and serves with it. The Imperial Yeomanry serve under different conditions.

LORD MONKSWELL: They may not serve under the same conditions, but the noble Marquess put the difference on the ground that the term of service was different.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I understand from the Secretary of State for War that all these Volunteer forces and Imperial Yeomanry after acceptance become subject to the ordinary military authorities the same as Regular soldiers. It is during the process of enrolling the men that these difficulties occur. I think that while a corps is being formed and before the men are finally accepted there ought to be some authority that one could appeal to during that period. It seems to me ridiculous to have to go to one of the heads of the War Office to ask whether a man can be allowed £4 for his rifle or not. With regard to the rejection, on the final medical examination, of the men to whom I have referred, the noble Marquess stated that the previous examination was conducted by a private practitioner. If my information is correct, they were examined in the first instance by the Volunteer medical officer.

COAL SUPPLY FOR NATIONAL REQUIREMENTS.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, I beg to ask Her Majesty's Government whether it is true that 400,000 tons of Cardiff coal have recently been consigned to foreign agents; and whether adequate steps have been taken to ensure a sufficient supply of steam coal for national requirements. It is most important that there should be an adequate amount of the best steam coal not only for Her Majesty's ships, but for the vast fleet of transports, and the announcement that 400,000 tons of what is after all a very limited commodity had been consigned to foreign agents gives food for reflection. I do not suggest that Her Majesty's Government should commence commandeering coal or that we should interfere with the ordinary course of trade, but the matter is one which should be very carefully watched. I should like to feel that Her Majesty's Government have got something in the shape of priority of call, and could, if necessity arose, appropriate for itself, paying whatever damages may be necessary, any large supply of coal proposed to be exported to foreign countries.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I have been asked to reply to this question in the absence of the noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough) who usually represents the Admiralty in this House, and whose engagements in South Africa render his presence here impossible. The attention of the Admiralty has been drawn to the rumour that a firm in Cardiff has contracted to supply a foreign Government with 400,000 tons of coal, but diligent inquiries at Cardiff have so far not resulted in any confirmation of the statement. I need scarcely say, whether the statement is correct or not, the subject of assuring to ourselves sufficient supplies of coal for naval requirements is one which is never out of the mind of the Board of Admiralty.

House adjourned at twenty minutes past Five of the clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Four of the clock.

NEW WRIT.

For Nottinghamshire (Newark Division) in the room of Charles William Sydney Pierrepont, commonly called Viscount Newark, now Earl Manvers, called up to the House of Peers.—(Sir William Walrond.)

QUESTIONS.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—IRISH VOLUNTEERS.

*MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he is aware that communications have been addressed to the War Office, in behalf of many loyal subjects of Her Majesty in Ireland, desiring to be permitted to enrol themselves as volunteers both for home service and service in South Africa; whether they have been informed that under the existing law the Secretary of State for War cannot sanction the formation of such corps; and whether, as more than one thousand gentlemen in Belfast alone have already come forward with offers of service, in addition to such offers from all parts of the country, he will take immediate steps to remove the legal disabilities which prevent these patriotic Irishmen from becoming soldiers of the Queen.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I fully recognise the spirit of patriotic loyalty that animates the gentlemen of whom my hon. friend speaks, but he asks the Government to make a change in the settled policy of this country that certainly we could not make without much greater consideration than we have hitherto been able to give to it.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny, N.): Are there any legal disabilities to prevent those men enlisting in the ordinary way, and going out to fight in South Africa? Will the right hon. Gentleman instruct the recruiting officers to try and enlist them?

[No answer was given.]

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the almost complete withdrawal of troops from Ireland, the Government will consider the expediency of authorising without further delay the formation of Volunteer corps throughout that country, following the precedent of 1782.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already answered that question.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Do not the people of Ireland regard it as an insult that they are refused permission to bear arms?

SIR WILLIAM BUTLER AND SIR ALFRED MILNER.

MR. WARNER (Lichfield, Staffordshire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether General Sir William Butler objected to the detachment from the defensive forces for Cape Colony of troops for the occupation of Kimberley, on the urgent request of Sir Alfred Milner that Kimberley should be held; and whether this objection by Sir William Butler was the cause of the friction between him and Sir Alfred Milner.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no foundation for the suggestion in either paragraph of the hon. Gentleman's question.

MR. WARNER: Is it untrue, or does not the Government know?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have asked of the Colonial Office and of the War Office, and neither of them have in their reports the slightest statement which would warrant the hon. Gentleman in putting that question.

CONTEMPLATED MILITARY MEASURES.

MR. WARNER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he would, in consideration of the great anxiety that prevails in the country, make some very short and general statement as to the military preparations being made by the Government at once; or, if that be impossible, if he will lay such a statement upon the Table now, and before the present debate is concluded.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already answered this question, and pointed out to the House that it would be not only unusual, but inconvenient and almost unconstitutional, to interrupt the debate on the Address in reply to the Queen's Speech by any such method as the hon. Gentleman suggests.

UITLANDER VOLUNTEERS.

MR. WILLIAM ALLAN (Gateshead): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, early last October, Sir Walter Hely Hutchinson, Governor of Natal, reported to Her Majesty's Government that he had received an offer from the Chairman of the Refugee Uitlander Committee of 75,000 able-bodied men who were willing to be enrolled as Colonial Volunteers; what reply was returned by the Governor to the deputation; and whether any steps had been taken to enrol these recruits for active service.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The number 75,000 is obviously a mistake, and on the 10th October Sir W. Hely Hutchinson reported an offer of 3,000 by the Refugee Uitlander Council. He informed the deputation that he would ask me to recommend the enrolment of 1,000, and on 16th October he was informed that the General Officer commanding had received instructions accordingly.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say how many Uitlanders are enrolled for active service?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes; I can state the number if notice is given of the question. Some thousands; but I cannot say exactly without notice.

JAMESON RAID—THE RHODES-HAWKSLEY CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has copies of the letters that were exchanged between himself and the Solicitor of the Chartered Company of South Africa in connection with certain telegrams sent to him for

- confidential perusal and return; and whether he will consider if those letters might be laid upon the Table of the House without detriment to the public interest.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I must refer the hon. Member to the answer which I gave in debate on the 19th October. I have nothing to add to that.

MR. LABOUCHERE: What was the answer? Will the right hon. Gentleman repeat it?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No. I prefer to let the answer speak for itself.

ARTILLERY STRENGTH.

MR. WARNER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what steps are being taken to bring the proportion of guns up to the standard of foreign armies for our troops engaged in the war; and what steps are being taken to supply field batteries at home to replace those that have been, and will have to be, sent abroad.

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. WYNDHAM, Dover): In reply to the first paragraph I have to say that the artillery with the fighting line of our army in South Africa is up to continental standards. The general statement about to be made will include a reply to the question in the second paragraph.

DEFECTIVE WEBLEY CARTRIDGES.

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the ball cartridges for Webley pistols, manufactured between February and April of last year and issued to the Army, were found to be so defective as to be useless; and, if so, when the discovery was made and what steps were taken to remedy the defect.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Some of the ball cartridges for Webley pistols supplied by one contractor between February and April, 1899, were reported as being defective, and orders were immediately issued for the destruction of all cartridges of this particular contract. In justice to the Webley Company it may be mentioned that they do not supply pistol ammunition.

SHOOTING OF BRITISH SUBJECTS COMMANDEERED BY THE ENEMY.

COLONEL PRYCE-JONES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the following item in the list of deaths published on Tuesday last, the 30th ultimo: M'LACHLAN.—On Christmas Day, shot in the Market Square, Harrismith, Orange Free State, for refusing to fight against his own countrymen, John M'Lachlan, junior, aged 30, eldest son of John M'Lachlan, of Wandsworth, and grandson of the late John M'Lachlan, of Lambeth; whether two other Englishmen were shot on the same Christmas Day, at the same time and in the same place and on the same charge; and whether Her Majesty's Government are taking any and what steps in respect of this matter, and for the protection of British subjects resident on British soil in the district in Cape Colony named Barkly West, commandeered by the Boers, from a like fate.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers, may I ask if he has any information that these men were burghers of the Orange Free State, and whether they were not shot for refusing to fight for their country against the enemies of their country?

COLONEL MILWARD (Stratford-upon-Avon): I beg at the same time to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is able to confirm the information received in this country that John M'Lachlan, junior, and two other British subjects were shot in the Market Square, Harrismith, upon Christmas Day last, for refusing to fight against this country; and whether there were any circumstances tending to exonerate the authorities of the Orange Free State in this matter.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am asked by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to reply to the question of the hon. and gallant Member for the Montgomery Boroughs, and I shall answer at the same time the question addressed to me by the hon. Member for the Stratford-on-Avon Division of Warwickshire. I have made inquiry by telegraph, and I have received a telegram from the Governor of Natal, dated yesterday, to the following effect:—"Report appeared in the press here some time ago and was subsequently contradicted. I know of no foundation for report, but am trying to obtain information through Harrismith refugees in Natal if any can be found. I am trying to ascertain on what authority contradiction was based." The answer to the third part of the question of the hon. Member for Montgomery Boroughs is that Her Majesty's Ambassador at Washington has been instructed by telegraph to ask the United States Government to make inquiries into the matter through their consul at Pretoria.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): As the Government have telegraphed to Natal with regard to the death of Englishmen, does the right hon. Gentleman see any objection to making a similar inquiry with regard to the death of Irishmen as to which we have been unable to obtain any satisfaction from the War Office?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I understand that that concerns the War Office and not the Colonial Office.

MR. T. M. HEALY: How is it the War Office refuses while the right hon. Gentleman is willing to inquire?

MAFEKING STATION-MASTER.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether Mr. James Quinlan, station-master at Mafeking, was allowed, before being shot by order of Colonel Baden-Powell, to write a letter containing a vindication of his innocence, addressed to an Irish Member; was this letter detained by the military authorities, or can the Government say what has become of it; were two Irish prisoners also shot by order of Lord Methuen, without trial; and will the Government, with a view to preventing reprisals by the opposing forces, suggest to the Commander-in-Chief that no prisoners in safe custody should be shot without legal formalities.

*MR. WYNDHAM: There is no information in regard to the questions raised by the first three paragraphs. The Government has full confidence in the discretion of the Commander-in-Chief in South Africa.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Did I not understand the hon. Gentleman the other day to say he would make some inquiry? It is strange that what is notorious to everybody else should not be so to the Government.

*MR. WYNDHAM: That which is said to be notorious is not always based on evidence to which careful examination can be given. I must ask the hon. and learned Member to submit a prima facie case showing he has gone through a preliminary examination of the evidence, and then careful inquiry shall be made. On mere report, however notorious, I do not think we are justified in interrupting the work of Lord Roberts and troubling him with questions.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask the hon. Gentleman whether he considers statements in English newspapers at the Cape not always friendly to Irishmen a prima facie case?

*MR. WYNDHAM: Certainly not, until we know the circumstances and the authority for these passages.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If Irishmen are shot by English, then I advise the Irish to go for the English.

THE CONNAUGHT RANGERS.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if his attention has been called to the letter of a soldier in the Connaught Rangers, stating that their major was to be court-martialled for remonstrating against the unnecessary exposure of his men; is there any foundation for this allegation; and what is the name of the gallant officer.

*MR. WYNDHAM: There is no knowledge in the War Office of any such court martial, or of any intention of holding it.

IMPERIAL LIGHT HORSE EQUIPMENT.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War will he explain why the request of the troopers of the Imperial Light Horse of South Africa to the War Office to be permitted to have Mauser pistols as part of their equipment, accompanied by an offer to pay for the weapons out of their own pockets, was refused by the War Office; and whether the troopers in question have since been armed with Mauser pistols.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The War Office did not refuse permission. On the contrary, it did what it could to facilitate the transmission to Natal of the revolvers which the commanding officer of the Imperial Light Horse had ordered from a private firm.

SOMERSETSHIRE VOLUNTEERS.

COLONEL WYNDHAM MURRAY (Bath): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, since the Volunteer rifle regiments of the county of Somerset were called upon to supply a company to join the regular county regiment in South Africa, about 100 men have passed the required tests; whether, as this number was somewhat under the numbers required, the company has now been disbanded; whether this decision can be reconsidered, and the services of these men who have come forward for active service accepted, and the company mobilised at once; and, whether, in order to make up the few required, some modifications of the regulations can be made in the direction of accepting one year men, or second class shots who have in previous years been in a higher class in shooting.

The following question on the same subject also appeared on the paper:—

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somersetshire, E.): To ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether an order has been given for disbanding the men of the 1st Somerset Volunteer Light Infantry, who have volunteered for active service in South Africa, after they have gone through part of their training; if he will state how many volunteered in the first instance, and how many were rejected by the medical officers; if men who had served in the Army were rejected because they had served less than two years with the Volunteers; what notice was given of the proposed disbandment; and if it is proposed to disband all companies which do not come up to the required strength, without giving the men the option of serving in other companies.

*MR. WYNDHAM: In answering this question I should like at the same time to reply to the question asked by the Member for Somerset, East. The number of men who actually passed the tests was 90, and, though some additional volunteers came forward, the total still fell short of 116, the required number. The formation of the company was, accordingly, not proceeded with. It is evidently desirable that the strength of companies in the field should be as uniform as possible, but the Secretary of State has decided that in cases where the deficiency in number is inconsiderable, special arrangements for making it good may be sanctioned; each case will be dealt with on its merits. The Somersetshire Light Infantry Volunteers are 3,000 strong, and the number required to form a company of the proper strength was only $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the whole.

MR. HOBHOUSE: Has the formation of the company been authorised to proceed?

CASUALTIES IN VOLUNTEER FORCES IN SOUTH AFRICA.

MR. THORNTON (Clapham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether a complete record of all accredited volunteers outside the Regular Army who have been killed, wounded, missing or taken prisoners in South Africa reaches the War Office and is officially published; and if all such volunteers have a distinguishing number or mark whereby they can be identified.

*MR. WYNDHAM: All casualties in local forces in South Africa are published by the War Office as soon as reported by the general in command. We have no knowledge of the detailed arrangements of the local forces, but from the lists which have already appeared there would seem to be ample means of identification.

FORAGE CONTRACTS.

*MR. JEFFREYS (Hampshire, N.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether very little hay and straw grown in the United Kingdom is supplied to the troops in South Africa; whether he is aware that both hay and straw can be purchased in this country at abnormally low prices; and whether, in future contracts, opportunities will be given to producers in this country to tender for the required supplies.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS, Birmingham, S.): Producers of hay in this country have full opportunity of tendering for supplies, but they are not as a rule able to deliver hay sufficiently compressed, nor is home-grown hay ordinarily fitted to undergo successfully the heat of the South African climate and the conditions of the sea voyage. Moreover, the military authorities who are responsible for supplies in the present campaign require large quantities of certain descriptions of forage which cannot be obtained in Great Britain, and the Secretary of State is not prepared to interfere with their discretion in the matter. Straw does not form a part of the field service forage ration. The Department is not paying more for supplies of hay for the Cape than the prices at which home producers have tendered.

BAD HAY FOR THE ROYAL DRAGOONS.

SIR CAMERON GULL (Devonshire, Barnstaple): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether it is a fact that a large quantity of hay for the use of the Royal Dragoons was shipped on the "Manchester Port" in October last in a damp and dangerous condition, and whether such hay was previously passed by a Government inspector; and if so, whether any, and if so what, steps have been taken in the matter.

MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: A considerable portion of the hay referred to was bad. The greater part of it had previously been examined in the ricks and approved. It was not, when being shipped, properly examined by the person acting as local superintendent for the supply reserve depôt. This officer has been dismissed. The contractors have been struck off the list, and the officer generally responsible for inspection has been censured.

TRANSPORT RETURN.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he will include in the promised Return of the Transports for South Africa the rate per ton per month, and other particulars contained in the similar returns of 1884 and 1886.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): For obvious reasons it would be injudicious to publish the rates for ships taken up by the Admiralty while we have to continue to charter ships. The returns quoted by the hon. Member were not presented until the conclusion of the operations for which the vessels were engaged. When the transactions connected with the chartering of ships for the operations in South Africa are concluded, it will of course be our duty to furnish full particulars on the subject.

THE TRANSPORT "JELUNGA."

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether a number of invalids and 500 women and children, the wives and families of soldiers in South Africa, were landed at Southampton on the 15th December from the transport "Jelunga"; whether the women and children were in a destitute condition; whether any nurse was on board, and whether six children died of cold and exposure; whether 10 women and 36 children, the wives and children of the men of the 18th Hussars and 5th Lancers, on reaching London on disembarkation from the "Jelunga," had to pass the night in the railway station at Waterloo because there was no train to take them to Canterbury; and what explanation, if any, has the Secretary of State to give of this incident.

MR. WYNDHAM: About 500 wives and children of soldiers were landed from the transport "Jelunga." They were not in a destitute condition, but they were in a very neglected condition, owing to the want of a sufficient staff on board to look after them. It would, no doubt, have been difficult for the General Officer commanding at Cape Town to provide a sufficient staff, but the Secretary of State for War is of opinion that proper care was not taken, and a reprimand has been accordingly sent to Cape Town. No nurse was on board. Six children died in the course of the voyage; they did not die of cold and exposure, since they died in the tropics. The women were periodically asked throughout the voyage whether they had any complaints to make, and they made none on the subject of their accommodation. The staff officer at Southampton and the officer of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families Association made every effort to help the women on their arrival; all were asked if they wanted money, and all said they had it. Ten women and 36 children had to spend the night at Waterloo because the London and South-Western train arrived too late to admit of their catching the train to Canterbury. I have answered this question at length because the Secretary of State regards the incident as most regrettable, and is anxious that it should be fully explained to the House. As I have said, care has been taken to impress upon those concerned the necessity of avoiding such mistakes in future.

NAVAL WAR DESPATCHES.

COMMANDER YOUNG (Berkshire, Wokingham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether any despatches have been received from the officers in command of the Naval Brigade describing the proceedings of that brigade at the battle of Graspan and the battle of Colenso; if so, when will such despatches be published in the same way as the military despatches relating to those battles have been published.

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, such despatches have been received, transmitted through the Naval Commander-in-Chief. It is still uncertain whether copies were sent to Lord Methuen and General Buller, under whose orders the actions in question were fought, but I am trying to ascertain this by telegraph. I have every hope that it will be possible to publish these despatches in the course of a day or two.

EXPENDITURE ON INDIAN TROOPS.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the whole of the expenses of the Indian troops in Mauritius, Ceylon, Singapore, and elsewhere outside the frontier of India, owing to the South African War, will be borne by the British Exchequer.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The whole of the expenses of the Indian troops in Mauritius, Ceylon, Singapore, and elsewhere outside the frontier of India will be debited to Imperial revenues.

AMMUNITION FOR VOLUNTEER PRACTICE.

MR. WARNER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if there is a scarcity of ammunition for practising purposes in this country; and whether the troops going to the front, such as Volunteers, Imperial Yeomanry, and other corps, have not been able to get enough to practise with while waiting in England for final organisation and embarkation.

*MR. WYNDHAM: There is no scarcity of ammunition for practice. Arrangements have been made for issuing to Yeomanry and Volunteers a sufficient quantity for practising before embarkation.

COAL SUPPLY FOR NATIONAL REQUIREMENTS.

GENERAL RUSSELL (Cheltenham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the statement that a firm in Cardiff has contracted to supply a foreign Government with 400,000 tons of coal; and whether, in view of this large order, means will be taken to secure that a sufficient reserve of coal be retained in this country for any possible requirements of the British Navy.

MR. GOSCHEN: My attention has been drawn to the rumour that a firm in Cardiff has contracted to supply a foreign Government with 400,000 tons of coal, but diligent inquiries at Cardiff have so far not resulted in any confirmation of the statement. I need scarcely say, whether the statement is correct or not, the subject of assuring to ourselves sufficient supplies of coal for naval requirements is one which is never out of the mind of the Board of Admiralty.

GIBRALTAR.

MR. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is now able to communicate to the House the recommendations of the Committee of Investigation which collected evidence at Gibraltar in the summer of 1898 with respect to the insanitary condition of that town and fortress; and what measures Her Majesty's Government propose to adopt, in the interests of the health of the naval and military forces at Gibraltar, for the compulsory demolition of buildings which have been condemned by the local medical authorities, for the improvement of the drainage scheme, for the prevention of the granting of leases of Government land to syndicates formed by building speculators and rack-renters, and for the provision of recreation grounds for the use of soldiers and sailors serving at that station.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I informed the hon. Member on the 24th April last that the report of the Committee was confidential and that it was not intended to publish it. The health of Gibraltar is good; the death-rate for 1898 was only 17.79 per 1,000. The remodelling of the whole drainage of the fortress was concluded early last year, and I have no reason to believe that anything further is required. The Sanitary Commissioners have already sufficient powers for dealing with insanitary houses and are exercising them satisfactorily. I have no information as to any Crown leases having been granted to syndicates of building speculators and rack-renters. The practice has always been, if possible, to renew leases to the former holders, or if they were not applicants to put them up for public competition. There is no space available on the limited part of the rock not reserved for military purposes for the provision of further recreation grounds, nor, so far as I am aware, has any recommendation been made to that effect.

ALLIANCE RUMOURS.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he has any papers to lay upon the Table or any statement to make as to the progress of the negotiations for the conclusion of a triple alliance between Great Britain, the United States, and Germany, announced by the Secretary of State for the Colonies at Leicester on 29th November last.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No such statement was ever made by my right hon. friend.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Is it with the cognisance of the Cabinet that the Colonial Secretary makes these absurd suggestions?

WAIMA.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what progress has been made with the Waima arbitration.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Negotiations are still proceeding for arbitration on this and other West African claims, but I am not yet in a position to announce an agreement as to the terms.

ROYAL NATIONAL LIFEBOAT INSTITUTION. — TELEPHONIC COMMUNICATION.

SIR CAMERON GULL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether a request has been made to the Post Office authorities by the Royal National Lifeboat Institution for leave to use the telephonic coast communication, if necessary, in connection with the usual practices of their lifeboats; and if so, whether any and what answer has been given to such request.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): After a personal discussion between representatives of the Life Boat Institution and the Post Office, the Postmaster General replied on the 8th ultimo that he did not see his way to transmit free of charge telegrams which were for purposes of practice only. The Secretary of the Institution acknowledged the receipt of this letter and stated that it would be submitted to his Committee.

TELEGRAPHIC CHARGE ANOMALIES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that recent instructions have been issued to telegraph masters and those in charge of telegraph offices to charge "M.P." as two words but "p.m." as one word, although the practice has been to charge "M.P." as one word; whether he is aware that "steamship" is charged as one word but "s.s." as two words, that "Saint Peter" is charged as two words but "St. Peter" as one word in inland telegrams, and that "St. Cloud" is charged as two words in foreign telegrams but "Saint Cloud" is charged as one word in foreign telegrams; and whether he will permit "Charing Cross" to go as one word in inland telegrams.

MR. HANBURY: All combinations of letters which are in the nature of cipher are now charged for at the rate of five letters to a word. In the case of all other letters not being words in any European language or in Latin each letter is charged for. M.P. is treated in precisely the same way as K.C.B., G.C.M.G., etc. The answer to the second paragraph is yes, and to the third no.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Does the Postmaster General mean to imply that a Member of Parliament is only a cipher?

MR. HANBURY: No; it is because he is not a cipher that he is charged the ordinary rate.

TELEGRAPHIST'S SICK LEAVE.

MR. STEADMAN (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that a female telegraphist of the Western District Office, London, visited Dr. Mason, the official medical officer, on 18th December, and, whilst admitting she was suffering from a severe cold, stated she could perform her duties; that, on the same day, Dr. Oswald, of Brixton, who has been in attendance on the telegraphist for some time, certified she had bronchial catarrh and debility, and ordered her to remain indoors; and that, although Dr. Oswald afterwards extended the certificate till 28th December, the telegraphist has been reported and punished with the loss of two days' pay for remaining from office during this period; whether it can be stated why the Post Office official declines to accept the certificate of a well-known practitioner; and whether the Postmaster General will personally investigate the circumstances which have led to the telegraphist being condemned for malingering though only acting in obedience to medical instructions.

MR. HANBURY: In the opinion of the Medical Officer of the Western District, who saw the telegraphist in question on the 18th and 23rd of December, her state of health on those days was not such as to require her to remain at home; but as Dr. Oswald, who saw her on the 26th, was of a contrary opinion, the Postmaster General has thought it right to give her the benefit of the doubt, and her pay for the two days in question has been allowed.

ENNISCORTHY POST OFFICE.

MR. THOMAS J. HEALY (Wexford, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, what is the cause of the delay in commencing the building of the proposed new post office in Enniscorthy; and if he can state when the work is likely to be begun.

MR. HANBURY: When tenders were obtained for the new Post Office building at Enniscorthy, the lowest one was so much in excess of the authorised expenditure that it was necessary to recast the plans with a view to reducing the expense. The Board of Public Works express the hope that the new building will be begun in April next.

TELEGRAPHIC ADDRESS REGULATIONS.

COLONEL PRYCE-JONES: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, will he explain why, at certain telegraph offices, telegrams addressed to Newtown in accordance with the Postal Guide are refused unless the name of the county is added.

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is not aware that telegrams for Newtown in the county of Montgomery are refused unless the name of the county is added. The name of the county is not necessary in that case, as there is no other head post office of the same name. If the hon. Member will bring to the Postmaster General's notice any case in which the addition of the name of the county has been insisted upon, inquiry will be made in the matter.

COLONEL PRYCE-JONES: I beg to tell the right hon. Gentleman I had a case this very morning.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member may put a question, but not make a statement.

DUBLIN MUSEUM—REMOVAL OF OBJECTS OF ART.

SIR T. G. ESMONDE (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether a number of objects of art are being removed from the Dublin Museum by the Science and Art Museum at South Kensington; and if so, for what reason; and whether, in view of the expense incurred by the Dublin Museum in providing for the exhibition of these objects, they will be allowed to remain in Dublin.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir J. GORST, Cambridge University): I can assure the hon. Member that no objects of art are being or have been removed from the Dublin Museum except those referred to in my answer last week.

DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE ON THE EDUCATION DEPARTMENT.

COLONEL WYNDHAM MURRAY: I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the terms of reference of the Departmental Committee appointed to consider the reorganisation of the Education Department and the Science and Art Department have been enlarged since its appointment in July last; whether the present terms of reference cover the question of the organisation requisite for carrying out the new duties which in April next devolve upon the Board of Education under Clauses 2 and 3 of the Board of Education Act; and whether he will communicate to the House the present terms of reference of the Departmental Committee.

SIR J. GORST: The answer to the two first paragraphs is in the affirmative. In answer to the third paragraph, if the hon. and gallant Member will move I shall be happy to lay them upon the Table.

CONGESTED RELIEF (SCOTLAND) ACT.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate what balance, if any, of the sums of money granted by Parliament for the purposes of the Congested Districts Relief (Scotland) Act is in hand; and what sums have been expended upon the principal objects of the Act—namely, the acquisition of cultivable land suitable for crofters and the extension of existing crofters' holdings.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): The balance referred to by the hon. Member was on the 31st ultimo £62,678 17s. 10d. There are, however, large liabilities by the Congested Districts Board for grants promised, upon the recommendation of their Agricultural and Works Committees, on fulfilment of certain conditions, amounting to about £27,000. In respect of migration only £1,451 has been actually paid, but negotiations in regard to the purchase of land at Bowe Syre, and other places, are pending which may involve the Board in payments of £18,000. The Board may thus be called upon to find £45,000 out of the balance in hand. I may add that the Board consider that it is much better to proceed with caution than by precipitate action in disregard of economic conditions to risk the making of mistakes which would defeat the purposes for which the Board was established.

WELSH RAILWAY DISPUTE.

MR. MADDISON (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the continued refusal of the Taff Vale, Cardiff, Barry, and Rhymney Railway Companies to meet the accredited representatives of their employees or submit the matters in dispute to arbitration, he will take immediate steps to put the Conciliation Act in operation.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. AKERS DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine) (for Mr. RITCHIE): I trust that no action on the part of the Board of Trade will be required in order to induce the railway companies referred to in the question to meet the accredited representatives of their employees.

WATERFORD AND LIMERICK RAILWAY DISPUTE.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that three men, named O'Connell, Murphy, and Halpin, were recently dismissed from the employment of the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company because of some action alleged to have been taken by them in opposition to the proposed sale of the Waterford and Limerick Railway to the Great Southern and Western Railway Company, a Bill for the completion of which is now before Parliament; whether he is aware that the offence of these men was instigated by the fear which they felt, in common with others, that the proposed amalgamation of these railways would cause the works in Limerick to be closed; and whether the Government propose to take any action to have the men O'Connell, Murphy, and Halpin restored to their employment.

MR. AKERS DOUGLAS (for Mr. RITCHIE): The Board of Trade are not in a position to take any action in the matter referred to, but I have received a letter from the chairman of the Waterford, Limerick, and Western Railway Company, which I shall be happy to show to the hon. Member.

GOVERNMENT METAL PURCHASES.

MR. WARNER: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if he could explain how the purchase of metals by tender has worked better than the old system of buying through a broker; and whether the Government have been obliged to give higher prices in consequence of the new system without gaining any advantage in quality or otherwise.

DINGLE PIER.

SIR T. G. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that several accidents have taken place at Dingle caused by the insufficient accommodation afforded by the pier there, and when the Congested Districts Board intends to proceed with the work of widening and extending it; whether he is also aware that protection is badly needed by the fifty canoes engaged in the fishing industry in Smerwick Harbour, and if he will use his influence with the Congested Districts Board to have a pier or slip constructed there as soon as possible; and if he can state when the work of constructing the pier at Dunquin will be proceeded with.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): In the absence of my right hon. friend I will reply to this and the subsequent questions which are addressed to him on to-day's Paper. With regard to the pier at Dingle, both the Harbour Board and the Rural District Council have been informed that before considering the application for a grant towards the cost of extending the pier, the Congested Districts Board wished to have definite proposals before them stating what local contribution would be forthcoming and what the entire cost would be. The Board have not yet received this information. As regards the slip or pier at Smerwick, the Board will be prepared to consider the question of a contribution towards the cost of that work upon learning from the County Council that they will carry out the work in accordance with the plans to be approved by the Board. With respect to the pier at Dunquin, the Board have not yet had an opportunity of having carried out the inspection which the hon. Member was informed was necessary in the Board's letter to him of the 9th May last, and no steps appear to have been taken in the matter of this work by the county authorities.

RELIGIOUS DISABILITIES IN IRELAND.

MR. DALY (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on the 14th instant the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Justice Fitzgibbon, and the Master of the Rolls were sworn Lord Justices for the Government of Ireland during the absence of Lord Cadogan, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; whether he is aware that Sir R. Martin and the Right Hon. J. M. Meade were also present but were disqualified from acting owing to their being Roman Catholics; and whether he will advise the Government to legislate during the present session of Parliament to remove the religious disabilities under which Roman Catholics suffer in Ireland.

MR. ATKINSON (for Mr. G. W. BALFOUR): The facts are as stated in the first and second paragraphs. Under the provisions of Section 12 of the Act 10th George IV., c. 7, Roman Catholics are legally disqualified from holding the office mentioned. The Government cannot undertake to introduce legislation in the present session in the direction suggested in the third paragraph.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Considering that there is a Bill before this House to remove these disabilities, will the Government give it their support?

MR. ATKINSON: That question should not be addressed to me.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Were not the gentlemen who were sworn in as Lords Justices themselves Roman Catholics?

MR. ATKINSON: That question does not arise. By law, Roman Catholics are disqualified for the office.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Is not this disqualification under the Act which makes all priests felons?

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Do not the Government profess in England to give equal rights to all men, irrespective of religion?

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Are not Catholics good enough to be shot down in South Africa?

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: What will Kruger say?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

IRISH HERRING INDUSTRY.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received several resolutions, including one from the Kerry County Council, dealing with the question of Government brand for cured Irish herrings; and whether, seeing that the Government brand on cured herrings is used to great advantage in the English and Scotch fishing districts, and that fishing is one of Ireland's greatest industries, permission will be given to use the Government brand in that country, so as to place the Irish cured herring on the same level with that of England and Scotland.

MR. ATKINSON (for Mr. G. W. BALFOUR): The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. Legislation would be necessary in order to authorise a brand for herrings in Ireland, such as exists in Scotland, though not, as is assumed, in England. It is desirable that the matter should be considered by the new Department of Agriculture before the Government can undertake to introduce such legislation.

MR. FLAVIN: Will the right hon. Gentleman make representations with a view to giving equal treatment to Ireland with other portions of the United Kingdom on this important question, or is this to be still another instance of unequal treatment?

IRISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT RATE ALLOWANCES.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in the case of how many unions did the Irish Local Government Board increase the allowance to be made in respect of the standard rate by reason of special circumstances, and how many applications for increased allowance on the standard year were received.

MR. ATKINSON (for Mr. G. W. BALFOUR): The Local Government Board

increased the assessment of the standard year under Section 49 (1) of Local Government Act on account of exceptional circumstances in forty-nine unions. The number of cases in which definite application for an increase under this section were made to the Board were fifty-six, but in the case of about twenty other unions resolutions were passed of an indefinite character demanding general liberal treatment from the Local Government Board.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am obliged to the right hon. Gentleman. Perhaps he will grant a return, as great interest is felt in this matter.

KERRY LAND APPEALS.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that sittings of the Land Commission for the hearing of appeals is arranged for several districts in Ireland up to the end of March, 1900; and whether he is aware that there are a number of appeals awaiting trial in Kerry; and if so, why is there no date fixed for that county by the Appeal Land Court.

MR. ATKINSON (for Mr. G. W. BALFOUR): The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. There are ninety cases in which appeals have been lodged from County Kerry but have not yet been listed for hearing. In twenty of these cases the notices of appeal were received during last month. A sitting for the hearing of appeals from County Kerry will be arranged in due course having regard to the prior claims of other districts.

MR. FLAVIN: Can the right hon. Gentleman say why County Kerry has been so neglected in this matter as compared with other parts of Ireland?

MR. ATKINSON: I can only deny that it is neglected.

BELFAST UNION.

MR. MC CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the proceedings of the Belfast Poor Law Guardians at their last weekly meeting, when Miss Carson, a female guardian, complained of having caught the niece of one of the employees carrying out in a basket beef, bread, tea, and other property of the guardians, without leave or permission from the authorities; and whether he can say if any report has been made to the Local Government Board, what are the details, and what steps have been taken in the matter.

MR. ATKINSON (for Mr. G. W. BALFOUR): The attention of the Local Government Board has been directed to the facts stated in the first paragraph. The matter has been finally dealt with by the guardians, who, on receipt of a report from the visiting committee, called upon the employee in question to send in her resignation.

SMALL HOUSES (ACQUISITION OF OWNERSHIP) BILL.

MR. AUSTIN (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of extending the provisions of the Small Houses (Acquisition of Ownership) Bill to the rural districts in Ireland, steps will be taken to empower the district councils to carry out such a measure.

MR. ATKINSON (for Mr. G. W. BALFOUR): The meaning of this question is not quite clear. District councils are already empowered to carry out the provisions of the Act, and in November last the Local Government Board wrote to every county and district council explaining very fully the object of the measure and the powers of the council under it, as well as the procedure to be adopted in carrying it into operation. So far as the Board are at present aware, about forty district councils have adopted the provisions of the Act.

LIFFORD COUNTY COURT HOUSE.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, on Monday last, Mr. Hardman, D.L., the High Sheriff of the County Donegal, with a posse of the Royal Irish Constabulary under District Inspector Dagg, turned out of the county court house at Lifford a contractor and his workmen who were employed in making some alterations in that building according to the directions of the county council; and by whose directions were the Royal Irish Constabulary employed for this purpose.

MR. ATKINSON (for Mr. G. W. BALFOUR): The facts in reference to this matter have not yet been fully ascertained, and I must ask the hon. Member to defer the question until Thursday next.

REMOVALS OF IRISH MAGISTRATES.

MR. MANDEVILLE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland will he explain on what grounds the Lord Chancellor recently removed from the Commission of the Peace for the county of Tipperary Mr. Kendal C. O'Brien, who held his commission ex-officio as Chairman of the Tipperary Rural District No. 1; is he aware that Mr. O'Brien subsequently resigned his chairmanship, but was again elected to that office; and will he explain why, when Mr. O'Brien on his re-election applied to be sworn in as a Justice of the Peace, the Lord Chancellor declined to issue the writ of dedimus, but issued a second writ of supersession.

MR. ATKINSON (for Mr. G. W. BALFOUR): In answer to the first paragraph of the question, the Lord Chancellor, in his letter of the 25th November sent to Mr. O'Brien, stated that he removed Mr. O'Brien from the Commission of the Peace for having been guilty of conduct inconsistent with his position as a Justice in having, at a time when the forces of Her Majesty were engaged in warlike operations in South Africa, at a meeting of the Tipperary (No. 1) District Council, put from the chair a resolution offering encouragement to the Boer enemies of Her Majesty and expressing a hope that they would have a complete triumph; and in having on a second occasion seconded, and supported by a speech, a resolution in the following terms, namely—

"That we congratulate the people of the South African Republic on what now turns out to be the victory of Glencoe over the same enemy that governs Ireland by force; and that we desire to place on record our admiration of those Irishmen under Colonel Blake and Mr. McBride, who are fighting for the Republic, and who truly represent Irish National opinion, notwithstanding the fact that some thoughtless, ignorant and dispirited young Irishmen are always to be found bearing arms for England; and that we trust complications may arise which will mark their unjust and shameful attempt to destroy a free people as the beginning of the end of England's political career."

The fact is as stated in the second paragraph. The Lord Chancellor refused to regard the causes in respect of which Mr. O'Brien was removed from the Commission on the 25th November as being ended by the time which since elapsed, or by the form of proceedings to which Mr. O'Brien has had recourse. The Lord Chancellor thereupon again removed Mr. O'Brien from the Commission of the Peace.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say what object is gained by thus stifling public opinion in Ireland?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is now arguing.

COMPULSORY HIRING OF LAND.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will state the number of orders for compulsory hiring of land, under Section 10 of the Local Government Act, 1894, deposited with the Board during the year ending March, 1899, and whether there were any orders which the Board did not confirm.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford):

Two orders of the kind referred to in the question were deposited with the Local Government Board during the year ended March last. In one of these cases the order was confirmed by the Board. The other case was not proceeded with in consequence of the application for the land being withdrawn.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

[FIFTH DAY'S DEBATE.]

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment [30th January] to Question [30th January], "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as followeth:—

Most Gracious Sovereign,

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament." — (Captain Prettman.)

And which Amendment was—

"At the end of the Question, to add the words, 'But we humbly express our regret at the want of knowledge, foresight, and judgment displayed by Your Majesty's advisers, alike in their conduct of South African affairs since 1895 and in their preparations for the war now proceeding.'" — (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.): I shall not waste much of the time of the House in offering a justification for those who brought forward this Amendment. Those who object to an Amendment of this character, I think, must be persons who are absolutely ignorant of the history of their country and of the history of the Parliament of this country. The Prime Minister told us the other day that the situation in which the nation finds itself was one of humiliation not devoid of danger. Lord Rosebery, in a speech made not long ago, said that the prestige of this country had been shattered, and would require to be repaired. I should like to know, from any man who has read the history of his country, when in such a situation as that the House of Commons has failed to perform its duty as representative of the nation, in calling upon the Executive Government to give an account of their conduct which has brought the country into such a situation as that, performing that which is not only its right and its duty, but which is also in the interest of the nation. Have the people who object to this Amendment ever heard the names of Chatham, Fox, or Burke, whose fame depends on the eloquence and the determination with which, in the great war against the American colonies, they persisted in opposing the policy of the Government? Have they ever heard of the man whose name has descended to my hon. friend the Member for the Berwick Division—have they ever heard of the course that Lord

Grey and the Liberal party took in the great war with France? To come to more recent times, have they ever heard—I am sorry to say I am old enough to have heard it myself—of the course taken in respect of the Crimean War? There is one authority to which gentlemen opposite at least will pay some respect—that of Lord Beaconsfield. At that period, in the darkest moment of depression in that Crimean contest, what was it Lord Beaconsfield said when he was supporting an inquiry which was regarded as a vote of want of confidence in the Government? The words are practically those of the Amendment now before the House. He said—

"The designs of the Government have been hastily conceived, and have been attempted to be carried out by inadequate means; they have shown throughout the whole conception and the management of their scheme a want of foresight, of firmness, of depth, and of all those resources which it became a Government to exhibit that had entered upon an enterprise of such moment. If an inquiry were not held now it never would be held."

That has been the invariable tradition of Parliament, which has not been suspended for 200 years, and I hope that while Parliament exists, and while the British Constitution is not suspended, it still will remain the tradition of the House of Commons. But what a preposterous doctrine is this. It amounts to this—that the greater the disasters in which a Government involves the country the more certain ought they to be of impunity, and that true patriotism requires that they shall not be called to account. This Amendment challenges the Government to give to the nation and to Parliament an account; it challenges their policy in entering upon the war, and their capacity in its conduct. That is our right, and that is our duty. The object of the Amendment is to extract, if we can extract, from the Government more adequate explanation of the causes which have led to what Lord Salisbury calls "a state of humiliation." I hope that the Leader of this House, the First Lord of the Treasury, will not think I am guilty of any disrespect to him if I do not enter upon a minute examination of the explanations which he has offered in this House and elsewhere.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Hear, hear!

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am sure he will not. He does not accurately recollect his own speeches. He tells us he has not the least interest in them. It is true that the Prime Minister said that if he had had notice he would have laid a bound copy of those speeches on the Table of the House of Lords. I do not know that that is a publication for which the right hon. Gentleman is particularly anxious, or whether he claims copyright in those speeches. But I think the right hon. Gentleman, if I may say so without disrespect, must be satisfied by this time that that is not an explanation which the nation expects, or which Parliament ought to accept. But this Government, which is united in its action, has taken the advantage which we know in criminal courts is frequently resorted to by accused persons—they have thought fit to sever in their defence. The Prime Minister has given his account of what led to the condition of humiliation of this country, and he says that this Government has been the "victim of the British Constitution." The British Constitution may be very defective, but it has served the purpose for two centuries. It was sufficient for the Duke of Marlborough; it was sufficient, I may say, for the two centuries in which the British Empire has been created. It was sufficient for Lord Chat-ham, and even the Duke of Wellington got along with it. I never heard Lord Palmerston whining about the British Constitution, and I never heard that Lord Beaconsfield contemplated a constitutional revolution. But then the noble Mar-quess tells us it is not only the British Constitution, it is the financial system of this country which is the cause of the present condition of humiliation. It is Chancellors of the Exchequer—I mean the genus, not the species—it is the Treasury system which has brought us into the position in which we now find ourselves. That originally was to be put an end to. But then happened an explanation—I suppose I ought to call it an apology—and we were assured that it was not this Chancellor of the Exchequer, that it was not this Treasury which had embarrassed the Government; on the contrary, they had done everything that could be desired. Then what is the relevance of this attack upon the Treasury if they have done all that you wish? What trivialities! We are to have an attack upon Treasury control. That is a matter of which I have had some experience, and this I will tell the House of Commons, that if you are going to abolish Treasury control, if you are going to allow Departments—the Foreign Office and the Colonial Office—to make war when they please without the control of Parliament, and to spend what money they please without the supervision of the Treasury, besides the many millions which this war will cost, the result of such a policy as that will be to reduce this country into a state of finance such as exists in other nations where Treasury control is not permitted. There is another cause given for this humiliation, and that is that the Government had not secret service money enough. What, Sir—with their majority they could not get what secret service money they wanted for the purpose of the defence of the Empire! Such a plea shows that they have very little confidence in their own supporters. They did not know anything, they could not know anything, because they had not secret service money enough; and then from his place the First Lord of the Treasury tells us that they did know everything. Is it possible that they can expect that the country will be satisfied with explanations of this character? No, Sir; they know very well that these justifications that have been offered have been received with blank astonishment, with disappointment, and I do not think it would be too much to say, they have been received with dismay. Those are the explanations which have been offered by the two principal members of the Cabinet. There is a third member of the Cabinet who has also offered his explanation, and I do not know that that contributed a great deal to our enlightenment. The First Lord of the Admiralty the other day explained the policy of the Government, stating—

"Then came the declaration of war by the Transvaal Government, and then, and not before, it was arranged that an Army Corps should be sent out."

The "man in the street" knows better than that. How can a member of the Cabinet be so ignorant of what has occurred, so ignorant of their own policy and their own action? The Royal Proclamation for calling out the Reserves took place upon 7th October, and the ultimatum of the Boers took place upon 9th October.

He said, too, it was never arranged that an Army Corps should be sent out until after the ultimatum of the Boers had been delivered. Then, when the right hon. Gentleman is informed of this, I suppose for the first time, he says, "Oh, it is a question of dates." Of course it is a question of dates. The relation of cause and effect is always a question of date. Of course, the ultimatum of the Boers was a reply to the proclamation for calling out the Reserves. What were the Reserves and the Army Corps called out for? It was to invade the territory of the Transvaal and to march upon Pretoria, and the ultimatum does not seem to me to be an unnatural reply to a measure of that character. These are the explanations which have been offered to the country by members of the Cabinet; but there was an explanation of a different character offered, not by a Cabinet Minister. I think a brighter light than any offered by the Cabinet was that contained in the remarkably brilliant speech of the Member for Dover, the Under Secretary for War. Old Members of this House always look with admiration and hope to such performances as that of the hon. Gentleman. A more remarkable exhibition of brilliant talent I have never heard, and I look forward with confidence in the House of Commons, when many of us will have passed away, to know that its great reputation will be sustained by such brilliant politicians. I was not very much consoled by the assurance that what has happened to us was the inexorable law of fate—that we must always be defeated in the first instance, and that we must muddle through afterwards. In these days when wars are short, when they last weeks rather than months, that is not a very satisfactory assurance, and for my part I think that the moral of the lesson is that the less you go to war the better. This Amendment challenges the conduct of the Government in reference to South Africa since the year 1895. The Prime Minister said—

"Why do you begin in 1895? The situation began much earlier: you must go further back. You must go to 1881 and 1884."

[Ministerial cheers.] I am glad to receive the assent of hon. Gentlemen opposite, because that is entirely my opinion. It is the fact that the policy of 1881 and 1884 lies at the root of the whole matter, that it was the situation with which this Government had to deal in 1895 when they came into office. What was that situation, and what was the policy of 1881 and 1884? A good many gentlemen, some of whom were responsible for that policy, have tried their hands and their memories by giving an account of that transaction. I confess I do not think it is a very commendable thing for members of Cabinets, whether, like the Duke of Argyll, they stand in a white sheet or not, to attempt to give their own individual opinions on the policy of a Cabinet. The policy of a Cabinet ought to be known by the authentic account of it given to Parliament by that Cabinet. We know what the policy of the Cabinet of 1881 was. It was very definitely declared. The Duke of Devonshire's memory is not so retentive as I should have expected, because he said there were only three of his colleagues still extant. He forgot three who are still alive. I happen accidentally to be one of them; in 1881 I was, with him, a principal Secretary of State. But it is not my authority I am going to quote, nor my memory. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary will remember that I was a colleague of his at that time, because I think I was perhaps his most earnest and constant supporter in the policy which was then pursued. I remember very well that a great honour was conferred upon the Colonial Secretary at that time, only lately a Cabinet Minister; he was selected to declare to Parliament what was the policy and what were the motives of the policy of the Cabinet of 1881. That is the authentic account, and the only authentic account that can be given, of that policy. I will read one extract, because it shows what lies at the root of the whole question of South Africa and the relations of Great Britain to that part of the world. I do not bring this forward as against the Colonial Secretary as an individual; I object altogether to attacks upon individual Ministers as distinguished from the Cabinet; the Cabinet is responsible; and, therefore, in reading this extract I am reading the declared policy of the Cabinet as stated by its authentic instrument, who is now the Colonial Secretary. This is what the right hon. Gentleman said—

"He did not doubt that with the large force placed at our disposal, we could have, if so minded, overrun the Transvaal and reconquered the country. Our difficulties, however, would not have ended there. We should have had to face probably the opposition of the Free State, and the Government would have been confronted with the agitation among the Dutch colonists of the Cape. They would have had permanently to maintain a large army on a European scale. They would have had to risk the best interests of South Africa and face an insurrection at any moment when any considerable portion of our troops were removed."

The right hon. Gentleman must have forgotten that when he questioned the statement by Lord Kimberley that that had been one of the motives which had governed the Cabinet of 1881. Those were prudential considerations. They have been stigmatised as cowardly. They are considerations that ought not to be left out of sight by any statesman, and they were in full view of the Cabinet of 1881. But that was not the only nor the principal ground of that policy, and here I hope I may be allowed to state in words characterised by all the force and lucidity which always distinguish the statements of the right hon. Gentleman what was the policy of 1881. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"But these were not the main reasons why, as he submitted, it was impossible for them to maintain the annexation of the Transvaal. He thought that course was impossible for any Government caring for the honour as well as for the interests of this country. It was contrary to their treaty engagements; it was contrary to the best traditions of a free country. When they found out that the wishes and sentiments of the Boers were entirely misunderstood—that they had gained the Transvaal on false pretences—they were bound in honour to withdraw from the position which they had unwittingly and wrongly taken up. He could not understand how those who talked so glibly of the honour of this country should fail to see that the greatest shame and humiliation would be in maintaining a high-handed breach of faith and destroying the independence of a people which they had solemnly engaged to respect. . . . They had the power in their hands, but they had not the will to use it. The strength of the giant was there, but it would have been tyrannous to employ it. If they had not so employed it, it was because they were not satisfied with the justice of their cause, because they did not think there was any end to be served commensurate with the sacrifice they would impose upon themselves and others, and because they had learned to recognise in their opponents qualities which were worthy of a free people. . . . As soon as it became manifest that to conciliate the Boers with any offer short of absolute independence was impossible, that the restoration of their independence was absolutely called for with regard to our treaty engagements and the honour of our country, to have continued to maintain the annexation would have been an act which he could only describe in terms which had been applied by a high authority to a different subject—as an act of 'fraud, force, and folly.' . . . For his part he was not afraid or ashamed to appeal to the House of Commons, to appeal, if necessary, to the English people, to justify the course which the Government had taken, and above all to approve their action in preferring justice to revenge, and in restoring to a brave people the independence of which they ought never to have been deprived."

That was the policy of 1881 as declared by the Colonial Secretary. I do not know if he has altered his opinion on that subject. I adhere to mine, and I am as proud of that policy to-day as I was then. Remembering that, and remembering how we laboured together in that cause, and that the right hon. Gentleman had been chosen because he was the protagonist and the champion of the restoration of independence to the Transvaal—[Mr. CHAMBERLAIN dissented.] My recollection is that he was expressing his sentiments when he made that declaration, and my recollection is that he was selected specially to state the policy of the Government because he had been and was an earnest and eager supporter of that policy. Therefore I was a little surprised when, in the last session of Parliament, he spoke of that policy as one for which he had only a corporate responsibility. I do not know whether, when he remembers that speech, he will call it a little more than a corporate responsibility. I think he must have been an earnest believer in the policy, or he would not have addressed the House in language such as that. That was the policy of 1881, and the same Government with the same corporate responsibility, so far from restricting, expanded that independence in 1884. There have been several Governments since that time. There was the Government of Lord Salisbury, and it, through the mouth of Mr. W. H. Smith, declared that by the Conventions they were bound, and that they could not pretend, therefore, to interfere with the internal government of the Transvaal outside of the Conventions. The same thing was said by the mouth of my hon. friend the late Under Secretary for the Colonies in the Government of Lord Rosebery, and that was the situation in 1895, the period at which this Government undertook the management of things in South Africa. It may be said that a great deal happened between 1881 and

1895; that there had grown up the population of Johannesburg, that the grievances of the Uitlanders had become acute, and that the Conventions were no longer applicable to the situation. That is a view which some people may have taken, but was that the view taken by this Government in 1895? All the grievances of the Uitlanders were well known. The raid was just about to take place. Had they in any sense altered their view of the rights and obligations created by the Conventions, and did they attempt to say that they had been in any respect varied? In 1896, by a singular coincidence, the policy of the Government—and here again I do not speak of the action of an individual—was declared by the same voice that declared the policy of the Government in 1881. The Colonial Secretary was then again the organ of the party he had joined. He had been before the organ of the party he had left. But his view was precisely the same. What did he say when he addressed the House in 1896? I will give the important sentence in that declaration. He pointed out the infinite dangers and perils which would arise from a war to enforce internal reforms in the Transvaal, and he said that to go to war with President Kruger to force upon him reforms in the internal affairs of a State with which successive Secretaries of State had repudiated all right of interference would be a course of action as immoral as it would be unwise. The circumstances which had occurred had not changed the view of the Government up to 1896 in any respect from the policy of 1881 and 1884. And then he proceeded elaborately to explain to us what were exactly the relations between the British Government and the Transvaal created by these Conventions. He said that “the right, and the only right, is one of friendly representation,” and in a formal manner he also declared—

“In the next place it is necessary that I should state clearly and unequivocally what is the position which Her Majesty's Government claim to hold towards the Government of the South African Republic since the Convention of 1884. Her Majesty's Government have recognised the South African Republic”

“as a free and independent Government as regards all its internal affairs not touched by that Convention.”

Sir William Harcourt.

Thus it is quite plain that in 1895 and 1896 the present Administration regarded the situation in respect to the independence of the Transvaal, and, therefore, in the absence of any right on our part by force to interfere in their internal affairs, in exactly the same position as it was placed fifteen years before. The right hon. Gentleman, as we know, made proposals to President Kruger, and he stated at the time that if President Kruger found them not acceptable, of course, he was at liberty to refuse them. That is the policy of Her Majesty's Government up to the year 1896. Nothing could be more clear or more definite. But that policy was radically altered subsequently, and it is to the reversal of that policy, in my opinion, that this war is due. When Her Majesty's Government arrived at the conclusion that it was moral and wise to force by war upon the Government of the Transvaal reforms which they chose to prescribe, and which had been declared in 1896 to be immoral and unwise, it is difficult exactly to fix. But that determination has been the cause of this war. The matter was opened at the Bloemfontein Conference. President Kruger was invited to go to that Conference. It has been said that there was a conspiracy throughout South Africa on the part of the Dutch race to expel the British from South Africa. [An HON. MEMBER: Hear, hear!] I should like the hon. Gentleman who says “Hear, hear” to reconcile that statement with the initiation of the Bloemfontein Conference. At whose instance was that Conference brought about? It was brought about by the President of the Free State; it was strongly supported by the representatives of the Dutch party in Cape Colony, and President Kruger, who was not bound at all in reference to his internal policy to go to Bloemfontein, went to that Conference. When he went there he was not told, “You have come here to receive our orders, to receive conditions which are to be a minimum”; he was told, on the contrary, that, although the Government disclaimed any right to enforce by war internal reforms in the Transvaal, they were within their right when they attempted by negotiations to improve the condition of the Uitlanders in Johannesburg. That everybody admits. What happened next? The first thing that President Kruger did was to pass a Bill for a seven years franchise. Well, that was declared to offer a most favourable basis of settlement, subject to examination. But subsequently, in the beginning of August, he went further than that, and he offered the very terms which had been laid down by Sir Alfred Milner at Bloemfontein. This was the offer of a five years franchise, subject to a condition. [Opposition cheers.] Yes, Sir, the whole thing turned upon that condition. And what was that condition? President Kruger said, "I have given you now what you have asked for. Will you give me an assurance that that is not to be a precedent for constant interference; will you give me an assurance that in future you will leave to me that independence in the control of my own internal affairs which you have guaranteed to me in the Conventions of 1881 and 1884?" That was the condition, and it was declared to be impossible. Of course, that revealed the attitude taken up by us, that under the name of suzerainty, or supremacy, or paramountcy, or what you please, the British Government claimed the right to dictate and prescribe, and to what extent they pleased, the internal policy of the Government of the Transvaal. I will not argue whether that was a right policy or a wrong policy, but it was a policy of war. It was a policy absolutely to wipe out the independence of the Transvaal. What is the meaning of "independence"? When you have the power to set it aside at any moment and prescribe what shall be done, there is no room for independence. Supremacy and independence are self-contradictory terms. The negotiations went on for a time until at last you abandoned all idea of negotiations, and you broke off negotiations. You said, "We will not discuss any more with you; we will inform you what our terms are," and you made it plain by the course you took in London that you intended to enforce those terms by war. Whether that was a right policy or a wrong policy, it was a reversal of the policy which preceding Governments had pursued for fifteen years. Then it has been said that you thought that peace was possible, and even probable, under those circumstances. How came you to think that peace was possible or probable under those circumstances? What could ever have induced you to believe that President Kruger or the Government of the Transvaal would ever consent without a struggle of life and death to surrender their whole independence? A phrase was used, "We will respect your independence," but that phrase was misleading if you meant to thrust reforms on the Transvaal by force of arms. Well, you said you expected President Kruger to yield, and the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House said he held that opinion in common with all the best opinion in South Africa. Where did you collect the best opinion on that subject in South Africa? Who told you that President Kruger was a man who, if you only menaced him enough, would yield the independence which he and his people valued so highly? We have been told that we are to place implicit confidence in the man on the spot. The man on the spot was not the best South African opinion. He was a newcomer in South Africa; he had had little experience, or perhaps he might have taken the course that Lord Rosmead had taken before him, and have pointed out to the right hon. Gentleman the infinite danger of the course which he was contemplating to pursue. No, Sir, the man in the street—many men in the street—knew a great deal more about the situation than the man on the spot. The great misfortune was, and it was one of the causes of this war, that the only men who were consulted were men on one side of the street—yes, Sir, that side of the street which was inhabited by the authors of the raid. Then, Sir, there was another source of the best African opinion at home—the helots, I suppose, who inhabit Park Lane. In my opinion, Sir, it was not the best South African opinion which misled you.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to assert that the persons to whom he refers were consulted by the Colonial Office, and that no others were consulted?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have asked, what was the best South African opinion? and I say that was not the best South African opinion, that there was another South African opinion that was a great deal better. I will refer to that remarkable correspondence that the Prime Minister of Natal had begun in the month of May. He then talked about the alarm that was felt at the prospects of war and the injury it would impose upon his own State, and entreated you, if you could, to avoid it. But did he think that President Kruger was going to give up his independence when he was menaced? No, Sir; he knew a great deal better than that. Then there are the still more remarkable protests of President Steyn, of the Free State. The First Lord of the Treasury had only to read these protests to see that the course you were pursuing was going straight to war. When you said you would negotiate no longer, but would prescribe your own terms, President Steyn said, "For God's sake, tell us what your terms are, and do not menace us by placing troops upon the frontiers of the Free State and of the colonies." You would not state your terms, and you did place troops on the frontiers of the colonies. The right hon. Gentleman asks me what people were consulted. Did Mr. Schreiner or Mr. Hofmeyr, who were the representatives of the Dutch in the colony, inform the High Commissioner that President Kruger would probably yield? The right hon. Gentleman said he thought, and, as I understood, the First Lord of the Treasury believed, it was possible and even probable. But the First Lord of the Treasury said he always knew that if President Kruger did not yield the consequence would necessarily be war. Well, the "man in the street" knew that as well as Her Majesty's Government. The whole spirit in which this thing was conducted—your military preparations and everything else—was one of contempt of the character and resources of the Boers. I believe these negotiations would never have been so conducted if you had appreciated the real situation with which you had to deal. You dealt with the Boers as if they were an inferior Power whom you had only to intimidate. Your experts told you of their military forces, and your experts could count their men and their guns. There seems to me to have been an element which British Ministers ought, above all, to have taken into account, and that is the indomitable energy of a free people fighting for their independence. That is a lack of imagination which ought not to have been wanting in the conduct of your negotiations. And so you broke off negotiations on September 22nd. The sands had run out, and you would deliver your own ultimatum. You prepared your military policy. You had a defensive force. You prepared an aggressive force that was to be sent out, and the Boers replied by their ultimatum. That was the finale of the stage of negotiations. If you had been properly informed of the people you had to deal with and the situation that was created, it was from the first a policy of war, and I agree, therefore, with the Colonial Secretary when he said that, looking at the whole thing, war was from the first inevitable. From the moment you determined that you would impose when you pleased your will in the internal administration of the Transvaal, war was a necessity and a certainty. But it was a direct reversal of all the policy you had pursued, and all the pledges you had given, and all the guarantees in the Convention by which, up to then, you had been bound. I will say extremely little on the second part of the Amendment and your conduct in preparing for war. I take the authority of the First Lord of the Treasury against that of the Prime Minister, and assume that you knew everything. What were you told by your Intelligence Department? You were told that there were 60,000 Boers, who had about 100 cannon, and you were told, you say, that 25,000 men were a good deal more than were enough to deal with these 60,000 Boers and their 100 cannon in defending the frontiers of Cape Colony and Natal. Well, Sir, great is human credulity. I am not a judge of these professional matters. I am not even that ordinary person, an amateur strategist. But this I will say, that if all the field-marshal in the world had told me that 25,000 men were sufficient to cope with 60,000 Boers and 100 cannon I think I should have reserved my opinion. I think that even if the Astronomer Royal had told me that the sun went round the earth instead of the earth round the sun I should not have immediately acquiesced. You left 25,000 men to cope with 60,000 Boers. You did not know that there were mounted infantry, and, what is more, that if they were that was a matter of any consequence. That was the preparation you made. You had announced before October that you meant to send out a corps d'armée to invade the Transvaal. You told us that that could not be there for thirteen weeks. What did you expect would happen between the breaking off of negotiations on September 22nd and December 20th, which was the earliest moment your

corps d'armée could arrive? That was a significant condition of preparation. Why were these vast preparations made by the Transvaal? The First Lord of the Treasury said you were not able to remonstrate against them or to make preparations against them—why? Because of the raid. Yes, Sir, the curse of the raid hangs round us still. It has been one of the principal causes of this war. The raid and its authors have ever since been the evil genius of South Africa. My right hon. friend the late Home Secretary said that the cause of the failure of the negotiations was that the whole atmosphere was poisoned with suspicion. Yes; but what introduced the poisonous suspicion? It was the raid. It was the conduct of the raid itself, and the manner in which the raiders were dealt with. In my opinion, one of the most serious questions raised by the Amendment which challenges the conduct of the Government in dealing with the affairs of South Africa since 1895 is their treatment of the raid. In my opinion it, in the end, made peace impossible. I am not going to enter into details upon this matter. But it is necessary I should make an observation on the attack my hon. and learned friend the Member for Dumfries made on the South African Committee. He charged the members of the Committee, of whom I was one, with a breach of their duty in not pursuing certain investigations. It has been suggested that members of that Committee had some object in not pursuing those investigations, that they deliberately hushed them up. Well, I speak for myself, but I believe no member of that committee ever had such an idea in his head or ever acted upon it. You will find the reason why they did not pursue those investigations stated fully on page 15 of the Report. It was impossible to pursue the investigations without adjourning the Committee to the next session of Parliament. That is the whole story, the sole and only reason. Witnesses could not be got whom it was necessary to examine. You might have sent Mr. Hawksley to prison. But it was the end of the session, and in ten days he would have been released. You might have adjourned the Committee. I know very well that the whole object of the suggestions which were industriously made by the authors of the raid, endeavouring to implicate the Colonial Office, was to prevent a verdict being given by that Committee on the authors of the raid, and if the Committee had failed to report then and there, they would have accomplished their object. The authors of the raid had influence enough in this House and out of this House to have prevented the re-appointment of that Committee eight months later. [HON. MEMBERS: Oh!] There is nothing else in it. It would have been impossible to have delayed for eight months the Report of that Committee. I leave that question for the present; but what I have to ask is—was the manner in which the raid was dealt with one likely to remove suspicion from the people of the Transvaal, or, indeed, from anyone else? Almost all the persons who took part in the raid have been restored to their former positions. The principal author of the raid still retains all the former influence which belongs to the Chartered Company at the Cape. I do not speak of the inferior people who have been restored. There has been no compensation made. Was there not by this treatment of the raid cause for suspicion that the condemnation of the raid was not so strong as it might have been? There is one circumstance to which I must refer, and in the reference there is something personal to the Colonial Secretary. The Report of the Committee said as to the principal author of the raid, that he deceived the High Commissioner, the representative of the Imperial Government, that he concealed his views from his colleagues in the Colonial Ministry, and from the Board of the British South Africa Company, and led his supporters to believe that his policy was approved by his superiors, and that no doubt persons had been induced to join in the raid under the belief that it had the countenance and support of the Imperial Government. The consequences of that conduct are stated in the Report. The result for the time being caused grave injury to British interests in South Africa. Public confidence was shaken, race feeling was embittered, and serious difficulties were created in neighbouring States, and it might have had serious consequences in one or two other directions. Such was the statement, and it was unfortunate and surprising that, while the Report was under consideration, the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary thought it right to state that in his opinion conduct of that character was not inconsistent with the personal honour of the man who was guilty of it. Why that statement was made at that time I do not know. No explanation has ever been given. I am sure it was an unfortunate statement; I am sure it has given rise to many evils, and to suspicions before we went into negotiations as to what our intentions really were. That standard of personal honour applied to such matters was one which only infused suspicion in the breasts of all concerned. It has done us great harm in the Transvaal; it has done us great harm, in my opinion, throughout the world. What, then, are we to infer from all these rumours, which I believe, myself, are slanders, by which the authors of the raid have throughout endeavoured, sometimes by actual statement, and constantly by innuendo and rumour, to persuade the world that the British Government connived at the raid? Sir, I believe, knowing what I do of the constant tissue of fraud and falsehood by which the authors of the raid carried out their criminal purpose—I believe that when that matter is probed to the bottom, it will be proved to be based on falsehood and fraud. Of this I am convinced, that until that is done we will never get rid of the suspicion and the mischief. The great and growing mischief will not be brought to an end by silence simply; it would be in the public interest, it would be wise and prudent that these slanders and these falsehoods should be rebutted and dispelled for ever. Sir, I cannot but believe that the right hon. Gentleman, not only in his own interest, of which he himself is the judge, but in the public interest, will agree that everything that can be done to refute these slanders should be done. Well, I have said what I have to say upon the policy of the Government which preceded the war, and the firmness, courage, and spirit displayed by all sections of the community have been such as might have been expected from the nation in the situation in which we find ourselves. The unequalled bravery of our troops, the unexampled loyalty and devotion of our kinsmen beyond the seas, are topics on which we can dwell with pride and satisfaction. Of the future what can be said? We feel that our military forces will triumph. Who can doubt it? Who can wish it otherwise? You will have 200,000 men in the field. Why, of course, as the right

hon. Gentleman said in 1881, "the victory is in your hands; you can subjugate the Dutch race in South Africa." No one can desire that this terrible struggle should be prolonged. In these preliminary combats of a few months you have already had a loss of 10,000 men. But when you have conquered, what is to follow? I do not venture to predict; but the Colonial Secretary will not have forgotten the dangers which in 1881 he pointed out would ensue after victory. We are embarked on this unhappy war. We must fight it out to the bitter end, and secure victory for the British arms. It seems to me, Sir, very much like the situation of two men of equal courage and of equal honour who have been committed to a duel which they never desired by the imbecility of the manner in which their interests were conducted by their seconds. They found themselves in a position in which they must endeavour to take each other's lives. There is one other topic, and the last upon which I shall touch, and touch with a cautious hand. Much has been said of the hostility felt towards us by foreign nations. That is not an agreeable topic, but it is one which in our heart of hearts we shall do well to ponder upon. I know the tendency, the natural tendency of human nature, to believe that all the hostility felt towards ourselves is due entirely to our own superior virtue; but this hostility of foreign nations is a theme upon which you might well pause when you remember that you have drained your country of all its natural land defences. I know the wild talk of mobilising the fleet, and I was very glad to hear that wild talk repudiated. I was going to offer to the House the observations I desire to make in language much more authoritative than mine. Lord Salisbury is a man who puzzles and perplexes us all sometimes by an inexplicable cynicism, and at other times by sentiments which seem to belong to the highest plane of statesmanship. Not long ago he delivered a solemn warning against the vainglorious, boastful, noisy, bullying spirit which is too often cultivated as the only true patriotism. I saw the other day that the German Emperor had been quoting a saying of Prince Bismarck, to the effect that "the panes of glass which the press have broken we have to pay for." Yes, and the British people will have to pay for them in the same way. But, Sir, the words of Lord Salisbury, delivered in the House of Lords in February, 1898, I wish to quote are these—

"I have a strong belief that there is danger of the public opinion of this country undergoing a reaction from the Cobdenite doctrines of thirty or forty years ago, and believing that it is our duty to take everything we can, to fight everybody, and to make a quarrel of every dispute. That seems to me a very dangerous doctrine, not merely because it might incite other nations against us—though that is not a consideration to be neglected, for the kind of reputation we are at present enjoying on the Continent of Europe, is by no means pleasant and by no means advantageous; but there is a much more serious danger, and that is lest we should overtax our strength. However strong you may be, whether you are a man or a nation, there is a point beyond which your strength will not go. It is madness; it ends in ruin if you allow yourselves to pass beyond it. And my Lords, I am sure that the noble Earl and his friends feel as we do the extreme gravity of the crisis in our country's history through which we are passing, and the extreme importance that we should not allow any party feelings to bias us in discovering and following the difficult, the narrow line that separates an undue concession from that rashness which has, in more than one case in history, been the ruin of nations as great and powerful as ourselves."

That is a lesson which we would all do well to learn. We have been told that we shall derive many lessons from this war, lessons in the art of naval and military preparations; but there is another lesson to learn which far more concerns the safety of this country, and that is—not to exasperate by an arrogant and insolent demeanour those whom we desire to make our friends, not to abuse and insult those with whom we have influence, and to carry ourselves with that moderation, prudence, and self-control which truly befits the dignity of an Empire which is conscious of its own greatness and of its own strength.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : Every man who addresses the House in this debate must form his own judgment of what it is fitting and useful and patriotic to say on such an occasion, at such a time, and in such an assembly. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has, no doubt, formed his own standard. I can only say that I think to-morrow the country will differ from that standard. What is the situation? We have reached a critical stage of the war. The situation is undoubtedly serious, although I hesitate to adopt the extreme language of some speakers. I do not believe that the country is in danger. I think such a phrase is excessive, and I think it is unwise to give to others the opportunity of quoting us when we depreciate ourselves. But undoubtedly there is sorrow in many homes. [Cheers from IRISH MEMBERS.] Do you suppose that all of us are not sensible of it? There is anxiety in all our hearts, and there is, above all, in the mind of the people an overwhelming desire that every nerve shall be strained to bring this war to a triumphant conclusion. The country is in need of guidance and of encouragement from this House, not from one party alone. The country asks from all of us a recognition of past mistakes and a reassurance as to the future. The attitude of the country has been admirable. It has extorted the approval even of the most hostile critics. Throughout it has shown no desire to find scapegoats, whether among generals or among Ministers. It has shown that it expects all of us to work together, with a single mind, to discover the causes of our mistakes, to find out the remedy, to profit by those mistakes, and to co-operate heartily, without regard to persons or to parties, in securing the end which we all have in view. That is the situation, and what is the message that the right hon. Gentleman brings to his countrymen? Whom is he addressing to-night? This House? Yes; but what beside? He is addressing all those who have suffered in this war, all who have suffered in this country, all who have suffered in our colonies in Africa, in the Cape and in Natal, where the greatest sufferings have been loyally and readily endured in the confidence that this country will see the matter to the end. And he is also addressing those spectators abroad to whom he referred in his closing passages. And to them what does he say? He enters upon a critical examination—characteristic in this, that it omits almost everything that we think of importance, of all that preceded this war—and with what object? In order to indicate to all these people that the war is an immoral war, an unjust war, that all the sacrifices have been thrown away, that the splendid offers and assistance given to us by our colonies have been futile and wasted, even if they have not been absolutely injurious; and he finds arguments for those who gloat over the misfortunes of the country. That is not all. He has embarked on a personal and historical retrospect of the situation, and of the events which led up to and accompanied the Majuba Convention. Unlike those of his colleagues at that time who still remain alive, he not only offers justification, which perhaps may well be offered, for the course which was then taken, but in the light of all that has happened since he gives us to understand that if he had influence and power he would do the same thing again, and in the middle of this war, while its fortunes are still hanging in the balance, that is the future which he offers to the people of this country and to our colonial fellow-citizens. One more remark I wish to make about the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, because he thought it appropriate to this debate and to this particular occasion to refer back to the Committee of inquiry into the raid, which was closed by his suggestion about three years ago, and to a speech which I made at that time, which also is now three years old, in order to base upon that a suggestion that that Committee should be reopened. All I say with regard to that to-night is that the matter is down for consideration on the motion of the hon. Member for Merthyr, and when that comes forward I will say whatever I may think it necessary to say upon the subject. The right hon. Gentleman will forgive me if, to-night at any rate, I fail to follow him, because I think I have a higher and a more important duty. How shall I deal with these criticisms against the policy of the Government previous to the commencement of the war? I might leave hon. and right hon. Gentleman opposite to answer one another. I might leave the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for South Shields to answer the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dumfries. I might leave the hon. Baronet the Member for the Berwick Division to answer the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. I might refer to the fact that those hon. Gentlemen who have taken this critical view of the proceedings of the Government have not added one atom, one iota, one new fact, or one new argument or suggestion to what they said at great length, and to which we replied at equal length, in the short session of October last. And why are we now, after this House has decided, after the country has decided, again to be dragged into that issue when we have still more important and urgent matters to consider? But, although I am not inclined to any repetition, although I refuse absolutely to be drawn into a discussion of petty details, yet I do feel that those who are the losers by this war, those especially who have lost in person or friends or relatives, are entitled to have it insisted upon again and again, whenever the question is raised, that this war is just and necessary. I want the House for a few minutes to look at the matter broadly—not to stop to consider the shreds and patches of the subject, but the general drift of events and the general current of policy. We have to watch the river as it flows to the sea and not to waste time in paddling in the eddies which seem to, but do not, delay its course. Speaking from that point of view, I say that the issues between Boer and Briton, between this country and the South African Republics, are great issues, are real issues, are not technical issues—that they do not stand upon the trivialities of debate, and the matter is not to be considered as if it were a civil case in a civil Court. The right hon. Gentleman, I will do him the justice to say, said that these issues cannot be discussed, as they are sought to be discussed by the terms of this Amendment, by confining yourselves strictly to the year 1895, when this Government became responsible for South African affairs. No, Sir, these issues existed—the root causes of this disagreement were there long before 1895, even before 1881. The raid, the Bloemfontein Conference, the franchise question—all these are not, as the right hon. Gentleman appears to think they are, causes. They are only incidents and consequences of the disagreement. This difference, this vital difference, did not begin with Majuba, but it was intensified by the policy of Majuba. That, I think, most of us believe who, as the right hon. Gentleman says I was, were personally and particularly responsible for that policy—even we are unable to resist the evidence of history, the evidence of all that has passed since. We cannot fail to see that, as a policy, the policy of magnanimity was a mistake. What happened? The right hon. Gentleman jumped from Majuba to the raid, and he omitted all the intervening time. Why, before the ink of the Majuba Convention was dry the Boers began to try and break that Convention.

Mr. J. Chamberlain.

Why, Sir, the whole history of our relations is a history of this continual effort to get out of the obligations which they had accepted, and which were the conditions of the magnanimity to which I have referred. How otherwise could it be when you think of the facts? Mr. Gladstone was not unfriendly to the Boers. Mr. Gladstone was the head of the Government which made the Majuba Convention; and yet, within three years of the signing of that Convention, Mr. Gladstone was obliged to take all those terrible risks upon which the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down dwelt—the risk of civil war, the risk of Dutch opposition, the risk of serious armament and cost to this country—and to send a military expedition to force and compel the Boers to observe the conditions of the Majuba Convention. That is only one illustration. What happened in the time of the late Government? What happened when Lord Loch went to Pretoria? The history of those proceedings has never been written, and perhaps never will be. But this, at least, is well known, that affairs at that time were in a most critical position, and that military movements were taking place in consequence. I come down to a later period. Only just before the raid, and after we had been only a few months in office, there arose the question of the drifts, and what happened then? We were advised and urged to send an ultimatum which must have led to war and all its consequences, if President Kruger had not given way. We were urged and advised and pressed to send it—by whom? By the Cape Government, in which Mr. Schreiner, the present Prime Minister, was then Attorney General, and not merely a consenting party, but an advising party.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S): Hear, hear, hear!

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The hon. Gentleman opposite will excuse me on this occasion if I think the subject is too grave to give him the notice which no doubt he expects. I have referred to the drifts. I want to refer to another incident which also occurred in the time of the late Government, to which I myself attach very considerable importance. I refer to that admirable dispatch of Lord Ripon's, a portion of which has already been published in the Blue-book with his consent. I may be told that that dispatch was not sent. No; and if I wanted to make a controversial point I should ask why it was sent to Lord Loch, the High Commissioner, and why he was afterwards told to withhold it? But that is not necessary for my purpose. What I want to point out is that the late Government, just before we came into office, had found that it was necessary and right, in spite of the limitations of the Convention, to interest themselves in the internal affairs of the Transvaal. And I want to point out that their remedy for the difficulties which then existed and which I found confronting me the moment I came into office was a five years franchise. That was the remedy which we borrowed from our predecessors in office, and which I suppose was good enough in their hands, although it is condemned in ours. I think I have stated enough to show that the difficulties between ourselves and the Transvaal were not the work of one Government. Indeed, I should not myself say they are the work of any Government. They are inherent in the circumstances; in the great difference which exists between Boer character and British character; between Boer civilisation and British civilisation; and between Boer education and British education. There you will find the root cause of all that has happened. What has been the Boer policy? I am not talking of any conspiracy; but what has been the Boer aspiration from first to last? It has been to get rid of every shred and vestige of British supremacy, and to substitute for it a Boer supremacy. I do not say that at all times, or from the first, the Boers contemplated that this was to be obtained by force of arms, although they have never shrunk, in my opinion, from indicating that they were ready when the proper time came to resort to arms. But what the Boers hoped for was that what they could not get from the Government they would get from the Opposition. I am not speaking now of the present Opposition. But if any Government had the courage to meet their assaults on the Convention, the Boers trusted to the working of our party politics to give them the victory in the end. And this must also be marked. It was a contest for supremacy; but for what kind of supremacy? The supremacy of the Boers means, as we know, the inferiority of every other race. Our supremacy, so far as we have been able to use it, has been used and will be used in order to secure the equality of the white races and justice for the black. Well, Sir, there was the issue. It was a contest for supremacy, dating back I know not for how many years, and for a different kind of civilisation. That issue had got to be tried; that battle had got to be fought; one or other party had to give way if peace was to be preserved. Does not the House think now that in this matter we may perhaps have drifted too long? It is easy to be wise after the event. But our hesitation—again I am speaking of no particular Government and of no particular period—has had the effect, year by year, of strengthening the determination and the power of the Boers to resistance. When we came into office we felt very quickly that a solution must be found. Things could not go on with a rapid and daily increase in the hostility between the two races. That was the worst feature of the situation—the growing feeling of dissatisfaction and irritation between peoples who ought to have lived amicably together, and who had, as a rule, previously done so. The time had come when in some way or other this long-standing difference must be settled. We believed then and we hoped to the last that a peaceful settlement could be attained. We hoped that when President Kruger saw how little it was we asked, and how determined we were to have it, he would give way. I take all the blame that the House considers is due for such a belief. If you say that our preparations were not sufficient, that we had not enough troops there when war broke out, that we had not a sufficiently large force there for defensive action, that no doubt is due to the fact that we hoped for peace, that we were determined to exhaust every means for securing peace and to do nothing that we thought would seriously endanger it. You may blame us, and perhaps rightly, that throughout this business we have been too anxious for peace. But no impartial man, no man who knows the facts, can truly and properly blame us for having been too eager for war. Our efforts were fruitless. Our objects were reasonable. They were the same objects that the late Government had. Our demands were moderate even to inefficiency. They were the same demands that right hon. Gentlemen opposite were prepared to make. The possibility of a settlement was open up to the last moment before the ultimatum was delivered, and the outbreak of hostilities; and the breach did not come from us. What more would you have had us do? What more would any friend of peace have had us do? There is only one alternative course to the one we pursued, and that is suggested in the speeches of some at least of the hon. Gentlemen opposite. What they say is this—"When you prayed, when you begged, when you supplicated, we were with you; we even looked on without opposition when you pressed, when you urged, when you insisted. But there we stopped. You may do all this, but you must not compel by force. The moment it appeared that President Kruger was not to be moved by your supplications, was not frightened by your insistence, at that moment you should have retired from the scene, you should have scuttled, you should have surrendered the interests for which you are the trustees—the interests, not of the nation alone, but of the Empire." A good deal has been said in this debate about Dutch opinion. I think the Leader of the Opposition said something—I do not know whether he referred to the Colonial Office, or Sir Alfred Milner, or the Government—but he said something about the coolness between ourselves and the representatives of Dutch opinion. I know of no coolness except so far as that arises necessarily from differences of opinion. But I will say this about the Dutch. I appreciate, as every one must do, most heartily and sincerely the difficulties in which our loyal Dutch fellow-subjects have found themselves placed in this situation. Their loyalty is more precious than ordinary loyalty, because of the strain upon them, because of the ties of race, and in some cases the ties of blood, which unite them with those who are now the enemies of the British Crown. I feel all that—I make all allowance for them. But I wish in return that right hon. Gentlemen opposite—and the Leader of the Opposition is a great offender in this respect—would not ignore the loyal British. If their opinion is taken we are told we are consulting the authors of the raid, and that the millionaires come home to reside in Park Lane. No, Sir, those whom we have consulted, whose opinion we value, are those who are now giving of their property, giving of their children, giving their persons, in order to aid Her Majesty in this conflict. The strain and stress of war has been upon these men in Natal and Cape Colony, and they are bitterly injured and hurt by the neglect which is shown towards their views and by the sneers with which they are occasionally treated. Now, Sir, I say this is my proposition. The war is a just, a righteous, and a necessary war. The opinion of the Irish Nationalist members in this matter is nothing. Their situation is exceptional, and, therefore, I do not appeal to them. I appeal to the party opposite, and I ask them do they say that this war is just, is necessary, is righteous?

[AN HON. MEMBER: They are divided.]

We know they are divided. I venture on the opinion that those among them—I am speaking now entirely of what I may call the British members—who take the view that the war is unjust, unrighteous, are in a majority on that side of the House.

[AN HON. MEMBER: You mean a minority.] No, I mean a majority; and it is a thing to which I think we should not shut our eyes; and which I regard as a matter of great gravity. Sir, it is only because the majority of the Liberal party hold that opinion that they put before the House such an Amendment as this. When you deplore the want of judgment, the want of foresight, and the want of knowledge, you imply, if you do not say it in so many words, that the war might have been prevented if those qualities had been possessed by Her Majesty's Government in the same degree in which they are possessed by the Opposition. Yes, but a war that could be prevented is an unnecessary war, and I am not here to argue that an unnecessary war can ever be a just war. But, Sir, that being the case, I proceed to ask a question. Why have not these gentlemen who entertain these views the courage of their convictions? Why do not they vote against the war? They have no business to vote for this Amendment, any one of them. They should vote for the Amendment of the hon. Gentlemen from Ireland, which is to follow the present one; they should vote for the immediate commencement of negotiations with a view to peace. That is the only consistent and logical course. Instead of which, what they are doing is to vote that this war is unjust, unrighteous, and unnecessary, and then to vote for its vigorous prosecution. Well, but what about the minority—those whom I fear are a minority—on the other side, those who agree with us that the war is just and was inevitable? I do not suppose that, any more than we, they thought always that the war was inevitable. I take it that, like us, having regard to what has happened, having regard to the proof, the evidence that we have been daily increasing as to the enormous preparations of the Boers, the evidence of a carefully prepared plan for the invasion of British colonies, the propaganda which we know has been going on among the Dutch subjects of Her Majesty, having regard to the conduct of the negotiations, having regard to the delivery of the ultimatum, and the invasion and annexation of British territory, having regard to the terms of the manifestoes that have been issued by the two Presidents—I take it that they feel, as we feel now, that the war could not have been avoided, except by an absolute surrender on the part of Great Britain of all those things to which we attach importance. Then, believing as you do that the war was inevitable, how can you vote for an amendment which says that the war ought to have been avoided? What an inconsistent position; how unworthy of those hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who appear to me to be in the position of accepting something to which they are utterly opposed, because they are allowed to vote for something else with which they happen to agree! A policy of that kind is said to unite the party; well, it may unite the party, but it serves in the face of Europe to throw doubt upon the union of the kingdom. I do not suppose that the country is at all interested in the logical position of statesmen on the other side. I believe, as I have already said, that the one thing which is in their minds is their desire to be assured that the war shall be vigorously prosecuted, and that the results shall be commensurate with the sacrifices which have been made. We have suffered checks, we have made mistakes; I am not anxious to dispute the blame. Let the Government bear the brunt of it until, at all events, the time is come, under happier auspices, when we can see how far that blame is to be apportioned between the system and those who have to administer it. In the meantime blame us by all means. What is urgent is to retrieve those checks, and to repair those mistakes. As to what we are doing in that respect I must refer again to that admirable speech by my hon. friend the Under Secretary of State for War, which, I am glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman opposite, excited as much admiration for its manner and ability on the other side of the House as it gave pleasure to his personal and political friends on this side. How do we meet this charge of mistakes? Not by denying the mistakes, but by saying what we have done since, and what we are doing. You say we sent too few troops; we are pouring troops into South Africa—you have been told that in a few weeks you will have an Army thereof about 200,000 men. You said we were forgetful of the need for mounted men; we have been increasing the number of horse infantry until in a very short time the number of mounted men in the British forces will be almost as great, if not quite as great as the total of mounted men in the Boer army. You say our artillery was insufficient, and that it was not heavy enough; we have sent battery after battery until now you have an unexampled force of that arm, and we have at the same time added a number of the heavier form of guns. When the war began no doubt the needs of the war were under-estimated, and at that time—it is part of the same mistake—we failed to respond as we ought to have done to the splendid offers which came to us from our colonies. We accepted enough to show how much we valued their assistance, but we hesitated to put upon them any greater strain than we thought was necessary. What is happening now? They are multiplying their offers, and every one is gratefully, promptly appreciated and accepted. Sir, we shall have in this war before it is over an army of colonials called to the aid of Her Majesty which will outnumber the British Army at Waterloo, and which will be nearly equal to the total British force in the Crimea. It is said, I hope not correctly, that in the first instance the services and special knowledge of these colonial troops were not properly appreciated by the authorities. I hope that was not true; but, at all events, Lord Roberts, with that kindly instinct which makes him so beloved by all who serve him, has selected from the colonial force a guard of honour which he takes as his personal bodyguard. Then we are told that a strategical mistake was made when a large portion of the Army was diverted to Ladysmith. I will not argue a question which is outside my competence; but if that be a mistake it is rapidly being corrected, and Lord Roberts will shortly have, if he has not already, under his command an army larger than that with which we intended to carry out the original plan of campaign, and upon which we based all our calculations, all our estimates, all our hopes, and which we still trust and believe will fulfil them. Meanwhile the spirit of the nation is absolutely unbroken. There is no sacrifice which they are not willing to make, there is no sacrifice which we will not ask of them if we think it necessary to success. We must go further than this, we admit it. Here is a war under new conditions, in a new country, with new arms, and with a people whose tenacity and courage are as admirable as those of our own soldiers. It has proved to require larger forces than anything that ever was estimated in any scheme that was ever framed by any previous Government in any previous war. That shows us, that convinces us, that the scheme which involves territorial defence as well as offensive action must be reconsidered in the light of recent events. A statement has been promised to the House on this subject, and with regard to it I will only say two things; I will say, in the first place, that one of the lessons of this war is the enormous defensive power possessed by irregular or volunteer troops when fighting in defence of their own country. To that lesson we are widely awake, and it must not be lost sight of in any review of the situation; and I hope that steps will be taken to take advantage of that splendid material which is always at our disposal in this country, and which, with proper assistance, with liberal support and consideration, and perhaps with a great deal of money, may be made the most effective defensive force that the world has ever known. The second point is this: When we propound this scheme we shall do so, not as a party, but as humbly endeavouring to represent the wishes of the nation. We invite suggestions, we invite criticism, we invite assistance to make that scheme perfect; we shall welcome co-operation, and shall not be satisfied unless the whole House joins in what is so important in the interests of the nation. I think that I have been frank with the

Mr. J. Chamberlain.

House. I have not spared the Government; I have admitted mistakes: but do not let us make perhaps a greater mistake than any, do not let us exaggerate. We have not told the whole case with regard to these matters. I think that those hostile critics who keep sharp eyes upon our performances might be led by what has been said in some quarters to justify their statement that this Empire is bleeding to death, that our prestige is all gone, and that we lie a helpless wreck at the mercy of our enemies. No, Sir. The situation is really very different from that. What other nation in the world could have put 180,000 men into the field 7,000 miles from its shores—a volunteer army—in so short a time? Where else could the transport have been found for such a huge force, working with such precision, such speed, and such safety? When we talk of defects in the administration, defects on the part of those on the spot and defects on the part of the Office here—I speak in the presence of military men—it appears to me that never before has so large a force been manœuvred, and at the same time the commissariat and the medical service worked so smoothly. There is something, then, to put on the other side. Has any other nation a better right to be proud of her soldiers? Englishmen, Irishmen, and Scotchmen have vied with each other in heroic efforts, and have performed what have been admitted to be almost impossible feats—impossible to any other infantry. May we not for one moment, forgetting all personal and political differences, stand on common ground in admiration of those who have added to the renown which already belonged to the historic regiments in which they served? I speak of the troops from this country, but, of course, I speak with equal praise of the colonial soldiers, who have been shoulder to shoulder in every conflict in which they have been engaged, and who have shown, besides, a special knowledge and aptitude which have made them almost invaluable. All alike are worthy; and I think that whatever we may feel—humiliation if you please—at the defects which have been disclosed, that humiliation must be accompanied by the deepest pride. I have dealt rather by way of summary than by way of argument with the measures by which we are trying to correct our deficiencies, and by which we hope before long to secure complete success. But when we have secured success, what then? It would be presumptuous, it would be premature, to talk now of the details of settlement. But the nation upon whom we are calling has a right to know, when a vote of censure like this is moved—which, if successful, would change the Government—what the Government think and what their would-be successors think upon the subject—what is, not the details, as I have said, but the general principles upon which we have proceeded. We have had utterances from several right hon. Gentlemen on the front bench opposite. They have been divided. As to such a declaration as that which was made by the hon. Baronet the Member for the Berwick Division, I do not wish to quibble about words, but I say it appears to me that we are in substantial agreement with him. The utterances of other right hon. Gentlemen—the Leader of the Opposition in especial, I single him out only because of his representative character—the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries, the noble Lord the Member for Cricklade were cryptic, but as far as I understood them, profoundly unsatisfactory. I say, speaking for the Government, that in so far as in us lies there shall be no second Majuba. Never again, with our consent, while we have the power, shall the Boers be able to erect in the heart of South Africa a citadel from whence proceed disaffection and race animosities. Never again shall they be able to endanger the paramountcy of Great Britain. Never again shall they be able to treat an Englishman as if he belonged to an inferior race. I have said I do not come forward as an apologist for the Government. If the House thinks that our mistakes are unpardonable, we submit ourselves to their judgment. But, although I will not apologise for the Government, I should like to say one or two words on behalf of this nation. We were asked the other day to dispel the gloom which it was said had settled upon the nation. I do not accept the phrase. I know of no such feeling. I know, as I have said, of anxiety, of regret, and even of a certain perfectly natural irritation, but I know of no hesitation, no vacillation; I know of nothing which approaches to fear or to gloom. Reverses try the temper of a nation, and our people have borne the test ; and every reverse has only been the signal for new offers of patriotic assistance from this country and new offers from our fellow-subjects across the seas. That, indeed, is a fact of the situation which I hope we can never forget. Never before in the history of our Empire has it so realised its strength and its unity. The splendid and, above all, the spontaneous rally of the colonies to the mother country affords no slight compensation even for the sufferings of war. What has brought them to your side? What has brought these younger nations of Greater Britain, induced them to spring to arms even before you called upon them?

SIR JOHN BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): Liberal policy.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: It is that Imperial instinct which you deride and scorn. Our colonies, repelled in the past by indifference and apathy, have responded to the sympathy which has recently been shown to them. A sense of common interest, of common duty, an assurance of mutual support and pride in the great edifice in which they are all members, have combined to consolidate and establish the unity of the Empire; and these peoples, shortly—very shortly as time is measured in history—about to become great and populous nations, now for the first time claim their share in the duties and responsibilities as well as in the privileges of Empire. Accordingly you have to remember now that you are the trustees, not merely of a kingdom, but of a federation, which may not, indeed, be distinctly outlined, but which exists already in spirit, if not in form. You are the trustees: they look to you as holding the headship of the race; and we owe to them an infinite debt of gratitude for the moral as well as material support that they have given us. This is a question in which their interest is indirect. They see with a clearer vision than we do. Their eyes are not distorted by party politics. Sir, I will never believe that these free communities would have given their support and approval to any cause which was not just and righteous and which was not based on the principles on which their own institutions have been founded. Whatever may be the future, I say we have to congratulate ourselves on the compensations as well as upon the evils of this war. In Africa, these two races, so interesting, so admirable each of them in their own way, so different in some things, will now, at any rate, have learned to respect one another. I hear a great deal about the animosities which will remain after the war. I hope I am not too sanguine when I say I do not believe in them. When matters have settled down, when equal rights are assured to both the white races, I believe that both will enjoy the land together and settle in peace and prosperity. Meanwhile, we are finding out the weak spots in our armour and trying to remedy them; we are finding out the infinite potential resources of the Empire; and we are advancing steadily, if slowly, to the realisation of that great federation of our race which will inevitably make for peace and liberty and justice.

*MR. MOULTON (Cornwall, Launceston): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make my position with regard to the war and to this Amendment clearly understood. I regret that in this case I differ from the views held by many of the most respected members of my party. I find I have to go down in the estimation of one I respect and esteem so much as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Monmouth, but I consider that this vote of censure, under existing circumstances, should never have been moved. I do not wish it to be supposed for one moment that I am speaking as an apologist of the Government. My own personal view is that the war is a calamity, and that it is due to the many grave errors that have been committed. I hold the view entertained very largely in the country that the Government deserves blame. This blame the Government have received wherever men have met together apart from party politics to discuss the war. It is blame based not on an elaborate review of the history of England since 1895, but on the broad and simple ground that the country has been allowed to drift into a most serious war with full knowledge that troops to the number of 60,000 were ready to operate against us, and without having an adequate force to protect the colonies that were threatened; and, further, that the Government permitted the general of a stop-gap army to take a course of action which has changed the whole campaign. But what has the country done under these circumstances? Instead of agitating against the Government, or showing every sign of disapprobation and restlessness, the country has remained silent—it has maintained what I must term a magnificent silence. In spite of this, now that we are met here in Parliament we are told by all the authorities on our side of the House that it is the duty of Parliament to commence its deliberations not by discussing what is necessary to be done in regard to the war, but by a vote of censure on the Government for the events which have led to the war. When one inquires why this is necessary, one is told that it is due to precedents established by our fore-runners in Parliament. I have a great respect for the great God Precedent; it is sometimes cited with great power, but I do not think we all worship at its shrine nowadays as we did of old. But unfortunately for the argument from precedent, but fortunately for our country, the position in which we stand has no precedent. If I look back into the history of England I know of no case in which England ever stood in its present position. And therefore before we are bound to act on these so-called precedents, we ought to inquire what is the position of England, what is its gravity, and what is the duty thereby rendered incumbent upon us now? The gravity of the situation no one can deny. We see a small nation, half the size of Glasgow, holding the whole of our armies in a state of immobility. And we see that with all the disasters that we have already suffered, it is quite possible that more serious disasters may come; and before the end of this session, which has begun in so ill-omened a way by dissensions, it may be that we shall see fifteen or twenty thousand of our fellow countrymen prisoners at Pretoria. It has been shown also to those who do not love us amongst the other nations of the world how a large portion of our army has been pent up in a distant portion of the world, and how this country has been left almost depleted of troops. Therefore, it becomes necessary that action and action alone should be our watchword. In such a moment we, as a consultative body, can do little. Action is so absolutely in the hands of the Executive that a consultative body is almost powerless. It can stimulate or it can paralyse action, but it cannot direct it. If we believe that action is all important to England at the present moment, that on the events of the next two or three months depend largely the position of England among the nations of the world, it follows that we, as a deliberative Assembly, should realise that what we can best do as an Assembly is to strengthen and help that portion of the Government which has in hand the action of the nation. Now, that portion of the Government, the Executive, is not of the choosing of those who hold the politics that I hold. It is a Government neither of our choosing nor of our liking, but it is the Government of the day, and every practical man must realise that it is the Government which will wield the whole forces of England for the purposes of this war. Hence we have no way of assisting the nation in this war excepting through the Government. The Executive is the personal part of the Government, which has to act with rapidity in all those things in which a deliberative assembly is wanting. Therefore I myself see that the only possible way for us to assist England at the present moment is by making the existing Government more capable of calling up and using the resources of England. If that be so, it is not enough for us to say that the Government shall have all the sums of money and all the forces it demands; we are bound to assist the Government in all matters that relate to the continuance of the war just as fully and in the same way as if this Government were a Government holding our opinions. Now I am perfectly aware that many people are afraid of such a doctrine as that, because it appears to them that it is an abdication of the position of a deliberative assembly. It is quite true that it is a recognition by a deliberative assembly of the limits of its power. But in olden days, in the time of the Romans, when action became imperative, a dictator was appointed, and the whole of the constitutional government deliberately abandoned its position in order that the dictator should be able to act with decision. Of course, these times have passed away with the forms and expedients which they adopted, but the need still remains, of which those forms and those expedients were the expressions. In a moment like this, we must do for the Government just the same as they had to do—namely, we must render the Executive influential, powerful, and capable of rapid and certain action. Now, my friends beside me will say, if we give to the

Fifth Day.

Government the same assistance, support, and consideration in matters relating to the carrying out of the war that we would give to men of our own persuasion, does not that amount to an approval of the war, and will it not be so understood? Sir, the nation is not so stupid as not to be able to distinguish between approval of the war and a right sense of its gravity. The gravity of this war is the justification for our united action; but the question of our approval or disapproval of the war is quite immaterial at the present moment, because we all recognise that the war exists and that if England is to hold her place amongst the nations it must be prosecuted to a successful termination. But it may be said if we follow this course is it not granting an amnesty to those whom we think guilty of so many grievous errors in the past? This appears to me to be a consideration of far inferior importance. I would let all the guilty ones escape if by so doing we should preserve England. The question of punishing the guilty is a trifling one compared with the saving of our country from further disasters. But it is idle to talk in this way at the present moment when you cannot get a hearing, and ought not to get a hearing, in regard to the past. The nation is thinking of the present and of the future; and it is giving a very slight hearing to diatribes as to the causes of the present lamentable state of things. If you want to make a nation realise that it has been badly handled, wait until a calmer time comes, and then your arguments will be fairly heard; but to think that you can get a hearing now is to shut your eyes to the obvious facts. But there is a further matter which I cannot pass by without a word. There are many who would say that before accepting the view of supporting the Government in all things so far as relates to the carrying on of the war, we ought to consider what will happen after victory is achieved. Let us wait till that victory has been attained. We are a long way from that yet. But as soon as that victory comes the imperative necessity of supporting the Executive will have ceased, and then the duty of acting as advisers in this House will have come back again. All that we have got to do now, when the country is casting longing eyes upon us to see how we can be helpful in this time of trouble, is that we should assist those who have command of the resources of the nation, in order that these resources may be used to the best advantage. But it must not be thought that I hold that we cannot assist otherwise than by a blind support of the Government in a crisis like this. I think that a watchful House of Commons, devoted to saving this country, may be of the greatest possible strength and the greatest possible value in guiding the Government. Let me give an example. Although the country may be willing to spend money, the Government may shrink from making the people feel the expense. Now, if there be such a tendency—if the Government is going to play the part of the merchant who waits till his bills are protested before he collects the money to pay them—nothing would prevent so disastrous a policy so much as a watchful House of Commons. We can stimulate the Government to make its appeals to the nation with due promptitude if we give to it the sanction of our authority. But that is not the only advantage of united action. One of the worst consequences of a motion of this kind is that as long as it is before the House it reduces to silence the only effective criticism of a Government—that of their own followers. So long as we are in a hostile attitude towards the Government, their supporters must be silent out of loyalty to their leaders, but if there is an amnesty with regard to the measures for carrying on the war this will cease. And remember, that if we on this side abstain from party attacks on the Government, the Members opposite ought to abstain from party support of it. It has been rightly said that we ought to have no sham fights, but we ought also to have no sham friendships. If we realise the need of our country, and that the country is looking to us to help it, we should see that while we on this side of the House abstain from embarrassing or worrying the Government we ought to receive from those on the opposite benches all possible help in guiding them so far as it is possible to do so. We ought all to aid the Executive through which we alone can work for England at this moment of national trial, and by this I do not merely mean that we ought to vote supplies, but that we should save it from all annoyance that would hinder its efficiency in the conduct of the war. If reverses come I do not want to add to the labour and anxiety of combatting them the feeling, "Oh, now we shall have new worries in the House of Commons." It appears to me that we ought to realise that our relations with the Government are much the same as the relations of the Government with the generals at the front—we have to give them a free hand and bear patiently the reverses which we have suffered or may suffer. There are people abroad who are keenly watching to find the first signs of weariness in this war on the part of England, that they may raise the cry "England is beaten." If you want to make the hearts of these enemies of England sick, you cannot do it better than by letting them see that so far from our reverses producing weariness or dissension, their only effect has been to make the Government step from the position of commanding this House, by a strong party majority, into the far higher position of an Executive which has behind it the willing, resolute, and hearty support of a united House of Commons.

GENERAL RUSSELL (Cheitenham) said he would not attempt to follow the noble Lord who moved this Amendment, or some of the hon. Members who had supported it into the academic discussion regarding the negotiations which preceded this deplorable war. He would not attempt to discuss the grievances of the Uitlanders, the Jameson raid, the Edgar case, or whether it would have been better if this or that despatch had not been written or published, or such a speech had not been delivered. He did not believe that at the present moment the British nation cared one penny piece for their threadbare topics. He would, however, say that, although he could not agree with the measures of these gentleman he was at one with many of them as to their conclusion. He believed with them that war might have been avoided, or if not avoided at least postponed. But how could it have been avoided? It would have been avoided had we consented to hand over our South African possessions to the domination and paramount influences of President Kruger and his followers. It would have been avoided had we agreed to abandon our loyal fellow-subjects to the tyranny and oppression of the lowest and worst type of corrupt Dutch Afrikaner. It would have been avoided had the people of this country been so mean and so untrue to their plighted word as to hand over the native races whom they had pledged themselves to protect to a rule and a tyranny which had been opposed to the traditions of the British people for many generations. He could not but regret the unpatriotic tone of some of the speeches delivered on this Amendment. He referred more especially to Sir R. T. Reid, Mr. Bryce, and Sir E. Clarke. No doubt these gentlemen believed that they were only attacking the policy of the Government, but in doing so they had in this instance been injuring the nation. These gentlemen had placed a weapon in the hands of the enemies of their country which they had not been slow to use. This was specially the case with the utterances of the Member for South Aberdeen, whose writings had given his opinions an influence, more especially in America, which they did not possess in this country. He believed nothing had done more to prejudice foreign press opinion against this country than the utterances and writings of the right hon. Gentleman as they were continually being quoted. The same was the case with the hon. Member for Plymouth. It was well known that his silvery eloquence had beguiled many a jury and persuaded many a judge, and that he was a supporter of the Government. Why, therefore, in this instance should he have turned against them unless they were in the wrong? The hon. and learned Member had informed them that his constituents did not approve of his action. He (General Russell) was glad to hear that this was also the case with a large number of the former supporters of the Member for South Aberdeen. He only trusted that at the next election it might be proved by a large majority. He believed that when the majority of the House and of the country had considered the whole case they would come to the conclusion that the mistakes that had been made were the fault, not of the Government or of the Executive, but of the system. He could not believe that the First Lord of the Treasury had been correctly reported as having said at Manchester on 11th January that in debates on the Army Estimates he had never heard the statement made that our artillery was not equal to that of other powers. He (General Russell) did not think there ever had been a debate in which the inadequacy of our artillery had not been brought forward. Moreover, a committee of Service Members considered this very point only last session. The proper proportion of guns was five to every 1,000 men. We had 180,000 men in South Africa, and therefore, instead of 410 guns, we ought to have 900 guns in the field. The proportion at present was only two and a-half guns per 1,000 men. The Government had been asked why they did not send out troops earlier. That again was the fault of the system. If in September the Government had sent out all the troops they could lay hands on, it would have upset our whole plans of mobilisation. Service Members had urged repeatedly that it was absolutely necessary as a matter of precaution that the Government should have in its hands an army corps of at least 30,000 men, which they could send anywhere at any time without calling out the reserves. He hoped when we came to set our military house in order that this would not be forgotten. It had been complained that colonial troops were not employed early enough. It was well known that this had caused heartburnings among our Colonial subjects in South Africa. They could not tell where the fault lay, but he trusted that in the course of the inquiry which the Government had promised, this matter would not be overlooked. With regard to the lack of a map, it was the fault of the military authorities in Natal and not of the Government that no military survey had been made. No explanation had yet been given with regard to the accumulation of stores at Ladysmith, for he could not imagine any place less suited for defence. It was in 1881 his duty to draw out a scheme for the defence of Ladysmith, and he had never had in all his military experience a harder task. The whole essence of the mistakes that had been made lay, not in ignorance of the numbers of the Boers or of their armaments, but in a disbelief in their fighting powers. Sir George White had been blamed for holding Ladysmith. But he thought that every impartial person would admit that if Sir George White—seeing that he had an enormous accumulation of stores to guard, and had no means of ascertaining accurately the strength of the Boers—had retired to the Tugela he would have been condemned for not making a stand. General White had, at all events, prevented the

General Russell.

Boers from over-running Natal. No doubt our Generals had made mistakes, but he had never heard a complaint against the commissariat or the hospital arrangements. He might say, in conclusion, and he felt certain that in speaking for himself he echoed the feeling of a large number of the Members of this House, that he heard the brilliant speech of the Under Secretary for War with feelings of intense relief. Then, for the first time, he felt assured that the Government realised the extreme gravity of the present situation—a crisis caused by reverses and defeats such as we had not suffered since we lost our North American colonies. He now knew that the Government, whatever might have been the shortcomings and the failings of the past, were determined that so far as human foresight could provide and so far at least as they were concerned, our gallant troops would be furnished with every means to bring this horrible war to a speedy and triumphant conclusion. He was now convinced that they appreciated those feelings of earnest resolve, calmness, determination, and confidence in the righteousness of our cause which had moved the nation to its depth in a manner almost without parallel in history.

*MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): We have listened to very remarkable speeches to-night which have greatly appealed to our patriotism, but which have not answered the questions which have been raised against the Government by this Amendment. In the speech which the First Lord of the Treasury made at Manchester a few days ago he stated that the Government had nothing to apologise for, but the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary to-day has been a speech ad misericordiam. Over and over again he said, "We have made mistakes; we failed to send enough troops; now we putting 200,000 men in the field; we failed to send out enough guns," and so forth, admitting to this House that mistakes had been made and faults had been committed. Now the right hon. Gentleman thinks fit to express amazement that men like myself who contend that the policy of the Government in creating this war was wrong are going to vote for this Amendment. He speaks in terms of derision, and says, "You, who say this war ought never to have been entered into, how can you have the audacity to come forward and say, Prosecute this war to a successful issue? What I should do would be to say, "Stop the war," which I do not believe to be just. Now I have no conscientious feeling on the point. We entered into the war because the right hon. Gentleman put the quarrel on us, and we are bound to prosecute the war until a point is attained when we can properly enter into negotiations for peace. The thing at which I am amazed is that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House who, at the commencement of this war, when they had reason to believe, and did believe it would be a triumphal procession from Cape Town to Pretoria, were the aiders and abettors of this policy of the Government, through the baleful influence of whom the war was brought about, should, in the hour of disaster to the Government and the country, ask the House to join in a resolution which condemns that policy. If it is a just and necessary war, it does not matter whether the Colonial Secretary has learned or not to be a polite letter writer, or whether he has made speeches here which are more worthy of Bingley Hall than this House. I am conscious of what fell from the hon. and gallant Member for Torquay, when he said that the country is looking to this House of Commons to devote its energies to bring this war to a speedy and successful conclusion. I agree with him that the first part of the Amendment is ill-conceived, and serves no useful purpose. I go further, and say, as an humble Member of this House, who feels acutely the position in which the country is placed, it is painful to me to listen to the recriminations from one side of the Table to the other as to speeches made four or five years ago, which were never read by four-fifths of the people, and only read by the other fifth to forget. It is not worthy of the House. With regard to the second part of the Amendment, which deals with our military preparedness, it has been urged against the Government that in the year 1895, or, at the latest, 1896, they knew that these armaments were proceeding on a scale which was totally incompatible with the necessities of frontier protection from savage tribes, but they neither moved hand nor foot to prevent them. It is the humiliation of the House of Commons that the responsible Ministers of the Crown should offer such an excuse as that they knew the Boers were arming after the Jameson raid, but they did not then dare to say to the Boer Government, stop the armament. Now that that armament has taken place and hostilities are proceeding, it is costing us the expenditure of millions of money and thousands of troops. That being so, I say that the Minister who shrunk from stepping in and coercing the Boers from obtaining further armaments because a band of buccaneers had invaded the Transvaal is unworthy of the confidence of this House, and as a Minister has betrayed his trust. That is a count in the indictment which the Colonial Secretary has not answered, and that is what the man in the street demands an answer to. It is not too late now for the Government to give some explanation which could be construed as a legitimate answer if they so desire. Turning to another point, Why did not the Government send out more than 20,000 troops to the Transvaal when they knew that war was inevitable? Did they know war was impending? If they thought it was not, why were the troops sent at all. They must have known it would only aggravate the Boers. These men were sent out because Sir Walter Hely Hutchinson contemplated the inevitable necessity of war, and represented to the Government that it was necessary to put 20,000 men in the field. The Government acted on his suggestion because they thought war was inevitable. With regard to the Ultimatum, I consider the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary's despatch was the real Ultimatum, and having sent these 20,000 troops, the Government say they did not send more because the Governor-General told them they were enough; and the First Lord of the Treasury said they did not accurately estimate the number of men required, because they did not know how many Uitlanders would fight for the Transvaal Republic and how many for the British, and they did not accurately estimate the Boers because they did not know how many would go to Swaziland and other places to escape commanding. If there was a doubt, why not give the benefit to the British public. What a disparity of numbers. A few months ago 20,000 men were enough, now the right hon. Gentleman put it at 200,000. When it comes to be written

there will be no more deplorable chapter in our military history than the action of the War Office on this occasion, and the unpreparedness of the Government. The matter does not commence in 1895. Since 1852—forty years—we have been in continual friction with the Boers; we have had little wars with them and threatened little wars; we have had to send out troops, or threaten to, owing to the aggression of the Boers, and yet the Government never took the trouble. [Laughter.] Sir, it is no laughing matter when 20,000 men have fallen victims to the insensate folly of the Government, or to the widows who have lost their husbands, and mothers who have lost their children. Yet would it be believed, those men went into the field of battle to take most difficult positions unprovided with a single effective plan of the country. General Buller, as he tells us, sends his troops under General Warren to take Spion Kop, and he takes Spion Kop, and what does he tell us? That the perimeter of that mountain was larger than he had reason to anticipate, which meant that while he occupied one position on the top of the mountain the Boers occupied another; and because Warren had not a proper map of the character of this mountain, 300 odd graves are on that hill whose rude stones are the standing records of the insensate folly of the Government. The position now is that Great Britain is depleted of its soldiers. How many effective battalions have we in the country? You have had to call on the Volunteers, and send them to serve 7,000 miles away from home, and those that are at home at the present moment have no ammunition with which to practise. It has been called in. We are no doubt safe so far as our shores are concerned, but if we are threatened by a Great Power in the North West of India where are our troops to send out. Then in the Sudan there is the danger from an army of 120,000 semi-civilised well armed men on its borders. I sincerely hope that if overtures for peace are made the Colonial Secretary will not slam the door in the face of President Kruger.

*MR. MALCOLM (Suffolk, Stowmarket) said: As the Leader of the Opposition seems to have decreed that this debate shall continue till to-morrow night, I may be permitted to say a few words to dispel the illusion that the country thinks the present Government incapable of carrying on the present war, or that it imagines the hands of the Executive Committee would be strengthened by a reconstitution of the Government. I agree with what has been said by the Under Secretary for War that the one thing which the people can't understand is that this debate should continue from day to day whilst much graver matters are waiting to be disposed of. They cannot understand how a party like the party opposite, whose one distinction in African affairs has been regularly and egregiously to mismanage them in every quarter of that continent, should advertise itself in this way to be ready to take the reins of Government, and to compose difficulties in a quarter where hitherto they have only made them. I think the House is being blinded and the country is being misled by a false issue. By the present Amendment we are discussing and are asked to condemn the policy of the present Government in South Africa since 1895; and at the same time we are invited to recollect the sacred doctrine of Cabinet responsibility. By all means blame the Cabinet which was responsible in '84 for the edifice of wrong which was then erected. Blame if you like successive Cabinets and successive Colonial Ministers who have been indifferent and slack in the administration of South African affairs since that date, but do not blame the one Cabinet of the last twenty years which has unmasked the true state of affairs in the Transvaal, which has exposed the growing humiliations of the Uitlanders, and has revealed the corruption of the Transvaal Government in all its nakedness. Of course, the new diplomacy is the thing blamed as the fons et origo of all these difficulties—a scarcely veiled attack upon the Colonial Secretary. I make bold to say that we are indebted to the new diplomacy. For twenty years the old diplomacy has failed; for twenty years this country has indulged in a sleek contemplation of its own magnanimity, referred to by Lord Rosebery as the "sublime experiment of Majuba," whilst all the time the Boers have been silently and cunningly arming to the teeth within the four corners of that hateful Convention; for twenty years this country has been content to wear the velvet glove, but now that it has been cast away and the iron hand of the

Mr. Atherley-Jones.

Empire has been revealed to all, it appears to you a fitting opportunity to blame the new diplomacy—to blame Her Majesty's Government for achieving that which you yourselves were unable to accomplish. Further, complaint is made that the power of our Empire has been exercised in all its might against two little States. But it is not denied that the corruption and the wrongdoing of these States have been great. We have yet to learn that wrong can be measured by the size of the wrongdoer, or that punishment should be meted out according to the stature of the prisoner. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen said in the course of his remarks that our Conventions should be strictly observed with small States, and I could not help interjecting at the time that "such obligation should be reciprocal," an observation with which he was good enough to agree. Then I asked myself whether we should have stood from France or from Russia for one moment such infringement of Conventions as we have endured in the Transvaal. I am convinced we should never have stood them, and I make bold to say that what we could not endure from Paris or St. Petersburg we should not tolerate from Pretoria. And at the same time that we are informed that we are bullying little States by the Member for South Aberdeen, the honourable and learned Member for Dumfries suggests that whilst negotiations were going on we should have been piling up arms in Natal against the day of battle. That is a bullying suggestion, if you please! I asked myself again—would any great State have tolerated it from us? When we were engaged in arranging treaties with France upon the Niger or in the Soudan, with Germany regarding Samoa, or elsewhere, would offensive exhibitions of the massing of forces have facilitated the passing of such conventions? Would they not have been regarded as intolerable by the other contracting parties? Undoubtedly they would, and we have no right to resort to these demonstrations of force against a small country which no great country would have tolerated from us for a moment. I agree with the hon. Baronet the Member for the Berwick Division, who said that the Under Secretary for War had, by his speech, lifted a gloom from the heart of the country. It is true he told us much that was relieving, but he intimated that he would tell us more, and we are only waiting until the close of this futile debate to learn what steps are to be taken by the War Office for the further defence of the Empire. That this statement which is promised to us is in a condition of suspended animation is due entirely to the Leader of the Opposition, who might have stopped this debate four nights ago if he had so chosen. But he preferred, sadly to his discredit, to invoke the Parliamentary traditions of battledore and shuttlecock instead of considering the interests of the country in this present crisis. I have said that this Amendment is a clever Amendment; it will surely enough scoop into the lobby all those who have forgotten their life-long motto of "Grievance before Supply." Those who have shelved the old Liberal watchword of "no taxation without representation"; those legal gentlemen who seem to think that we in England have a monopoly of that clause in Magna Charta which declares "that justice shall not be sold, denied or delayed to any man," as well as by those who consider us too aggressive in our present policy or not aggressive enough. But the Amendment is not too clever to prevent Members on this side of the House joining together upon this occasion, whatever their feelings may be upon one detail or upon another of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. We recognise it as being a vote of censure upon the Government, and therefore I believe we shall stand together because we disagree in toto with the letter and the spirit of the Amendment. We at least will record to-morrow our trust in the governing capacity of the Executive of the day in this time of stress and of battle, and we shall thank heaven that we have a Government which has at least disclosed to the world the true inwardness of this Transvaal rebellion.

*MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): It seemed to me somewhat painful to hear the right hon. Gentleman boasting in eager and almost extravagant terms of the enthusiasm of the country in sending out an Army of 200,000 men. I am one of those who do not share the hysterical disbelief in the capacity of the British race to deal with any problem that is placed before them. But I do think that, if the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues had invited the House of Commons and the country last June to consider this enormous scheme of sending a force of 200,000 men 7,000 miles away and incurring a liability of perhaps hundreds of millions sterling; if they had gravely proposed such a policy as that in order simply to enforce the granting of a five years retrospective franchise to the Uitlanders, I venture to think that this House and the country would have refused absolutely to consider proposals so enormously disproportioned to the end to be attained, and would have promptly rejected them with scorn. The right hon. Gentleman added strength to my contention, because he said "our objects are reasonable, our demands are moderate," and that the proposals of the Government were the same as those made in the well-known despatch of Lord Ripon, when Colonial Secretary in 1894, which was not actually sent to the Transvaal Government. The right hon. Gentleman says to us, "Your proposals have been the same as our proposals are, and yet you say, 'We must compel acceptance of these proposals by force.'" That came strangely from the right hon. Gentleman, because four years ago, in August, 1896, he ridiculed the idea of sending an army "to force President Kruger to grant reforms," and said: "That is not my policy, and it never will be my policy." It seems to me that there is a fundamental inconsistency here, as elsewhere, in the statements of the right hon. Gentleman. But I rejoice that the right hon. Gentleman has again defined the limits and the objects of his policy in the definite terms he did in his speech to-night. I think that relieves us from some difficulties in dealing with this question. The right hon. Gentleman takes the footing that this war is a just and a necessary war, and he seemed to regard as a reproach to the Opposition that some of them held that this war was an unjust and a needless war. But we do take that view, and I pin the right hon. Gentleman to his contention that his objects are reasonable, that his policy was the same as the despatch of Lord Ripon, and with that contention in his mouth the right hon. Gentleman has no right to say that we are not justified in arguing, on the facts and on the merits, that this war is a needless and an iniquitous war. We have had recently put in our hands a new Blue-book on this question. I will only refer to one passage in that Blue-book which seems to me to add force to the unanswerable contention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin and the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth in the debate of October 19th. The passage I wish to refer to is in a despatch from Mr. Conyngham Greene, in which he dwells upon the second telegram sent by the Transvaal Government on August 21st in connection with their proposals for a five years franchise. He says that he is compelled to regard this second telegram—in which the Transvaal Government reminded the British Government that the conditions which they had merely alluded to in the first telegram were conditions which were absolutely essential to the acceptance of the five years franchise—as making the transaction a bargain pure and simple, and Mr. Conyngham Greene remarks that this additional telegram made it clear that the negotiations "were meant to be off" and therefore he had come to the conclusion, and advised the High Commissioner that it was not worth while to pursue the negotiations further. But what the Boers thus stipulated, most reasonably, was only to have an assurance that the Convention should be maintained, and to insist on the freedom and independence we had again and again promised them—a consideration for granting the franchise to the Uitlanders. This despatch must have reached the Colonial Office, and how can we reconcile those words with the statement of the Colonial Secretary last October in reply to the hon. Member for Plymouth—that he fully intended to accept these very conditions and limitations which are in this despatch said to have closed the negotiations. The Colonial Secretary has said that this is a great natural issue which ought to be dealt with without regard to party. That is exactly the feeling with which I wish myself to approach this subject. I must say that I have been deeply pained at the ignoble and unfair taunts which have been levelled at us not only in this House but in the country—that because we criticise the policy of the Government, and because we say that policy has landed us in an unjust and unnecessary war, that, consequently, we are lacking in patriotism, that we do not appreciate the grave peril in which this country now stands, and that we are not showing proper sympathy for the Army. The man hardly exists who does not feel from the bottom of his heart the fullest sympathy with our troops who are struggling so magnificently, and who does not feel the most passionate sympathy with those who have suffered of high and low degree the loss of friends and relatives in this war. If we are sincere in our belief that this war is unjust—and I am speaking my own honest conviction—that fact merely deepens our indignation against those whose folly or misconduct has involved this country in the war. The Colonial Secretary has referred to the magnificent display—I won't call it loyalty, but of the devoted, eager spirit to help to the utmost—by our colonies, and nothing could be more splendid and more praiseworthy. But what was the real reason for that? When Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Canadian Premier, was over here in the year 1897, he said: "We are loyal because we are free." The real principle which underlies this colonial support is that they have been granted freedom and the power to manage their own affairs. They are acting not in obedience to the orders of martinets in Downing Street, but of their own goodwill they have resolved of their own choice to send their own troops in their own way. That is the secret of this Colonial loyalty. That is the natural reward which this country receives for granting freedom and for showing our confidence and goodwill to these people who are allied with us all over the world. Nothing could condemn the Government policy more than this. Had we treated the Boers as we have done our Colonies—if we had shown the same confidence and goodwill—such a policy would have gained for us the sympathy and perhaps, at some time, even the active support, instead of the hostility of the South African Republic. I should just like to refer to one other passage in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. He said that this war is likely to lead to the two races respecting each other when it is over. But what did he say three years ago? He said that such a war "would leave behind it the embers of a strife which he believed generations would hardly be long enough to extinguish." The one speech, as usual, contradicts the other, and the whole case of the Colonial Secretary from beginning to end could be answered from his own multifarious and not very satisfactory speeches. We have had the official apology in the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury at Manchester—an apology not improved upon in either House. That defence has been the worst impeachment of the Ministry. I do not want to dwell upon the military side of this question, for that has been dealt with by many speakers, notably by the Member for the Berwick Division of Northumberland in a speech of critical analysis and pulverising power. That speech is one which, in my opinion, shows that the Ministry have been really playing with the country. I would turn to the more serious side—what the Ministry have done to secure peace. What is the essential test whether this is a just or unnecessary war? This war has sprung out of the negotiations since last spring. We are therefore entitled to ask what is the interpretation which the First Lord of the Treasury and Her Majesty's Government put upon that chapter of our diplomacy. We know very well in what way those negotiations commenced. Sir Alfred Milner, at the Bloemfontein Conference, described the franchise as a policy which would place in the hands of the Outlanders themselves the power of enabling them, by becoming citizens of the Transvaal, to remove gradually by their own efforts the grievances which they suffered. That is a policy with which many of us on this side of the House have heartily sympathised. We know how that policy was pressed home again and again. We have heard the statement of the Colonial Secretary that what he demanded was the immediate and substantial representation of the Outlanders in the Volksraad of the South African Republic. Was this proposal ever honestly and sincerely made by Her Majesty's Government? The First Lord of the Treasury, at Manchester, says—

"The probability was that we should obtain such rights for the Uitlanders in the Transvaal as should at least tide over the present year, and the present difficulty until, perhaps, some period arrived when, either by accident or design, it might suit the Boer leaders to precipitate a struggle."

It seems to me that one can put no interpretation on those words other than this—that the First Lord of the Treasury was compelled to anticipate a terrible war such as we have upon us now, at some time or other, and that the franchise proposals were merely of the nature of a stop-gap, an expedient to gain time, and not a solution of the question at all. Well, then, I will just put this question to the House: Suppose that through the principle laid down by the Colonial Secretary we should have had immediate and substantial representation of the Outlanders: suppose that had been sincerely meant and accepted by President Kruger; suppose they really wanted the franchise and that it had been effectively carried out. Why, that representation would have added from 20,000 to 40,000 citizens to the South African Republic who would have been bound in honour, if there is honour in any of these transactions, to fight against us in the event of the war which the First Lord of the Treasury expected. Could anything be more fatuous than that? If it was not meant seriously how can we be surprised that an acute and vigilant people like the Boers should have their suspicions intensified and became convinced that the whole of this policy was tainted with duplicity, and that they were being marked out as the victims of the ambitious policy of Mr. Rhodes and the Colonial Secretary from the beginning, and that there was no honesty or straightforwardness in the whole business from beginning to end? When we thus left the Boers to choose whether our policy was one of imbecility or duplicity, I ask if either of those policies is worthy of a great nation? What can be less creditable to a great, intelligent, and supreme people like the English, dealing with a humble, simple people like the Boers, who are less enlightened and less progressive, and whom we ought to have taken by the hand and shown the right way to develop their future? Instead of this we had convinced them that they could see nothing ahead but a policy of war, and was it any wonder then that they could only regard this country with suspicion and dislike? We have often heard in this House and elsewhere that the Outlanders are unanimously in favour of these proposals, but I could occupy the time of the House far longer than I should be justified in doing if I attempted to quote in full from the many statements I have here mainly from miners from Northumberland, Lancashire, and South Wales, who have returned to England from the Transvaal. They are men who all state that they went out there because they could get good wages, and after spending a few years there, return to England with considerable sums of money. These miners state that there was no agitation for these reforms, that there was no demand for the franchise, and that the greater part of the working men believe that the result of the transference of the Government of the Transvaal from the Boers to the English will be a rapid and decisive diminution of their wages. They are statements not from capitalists and speculators, but from men who have gone out there to work in the mines, whose statements are absolutely trustworthy. They say the Outlander petitions were got up by deliberate threats, that if they did not sign they would have to leave the mine. They were got up by endless floods of beer which had to be resorted to in order to obtain signatures. I could quote passages to show that the names of hundreds of those appearing on the petitions knew absolutely nothing about them. The real secret of this war is the absolute sense of distrust and lack of confidence which English policy has created in the Transvaal. I notice that Her Majesty's Government have now adopted the raid as a legitimate and complete excuse for the position in which they stand. They have adopted apparently the wise and weighty words of a man who is, I regret to say, no longer in this House, and whom I always looked upon as one of the most straightforward men I have seen in Parliament—I allude to Lord Charles Beresford. Speaking upon this subject he said—

“Blame should be attached almost entirely, if not entirely, to that lamentable and contemptible raid. Many of his friends were in that raid—but the question of the honour of one's country was very much bigger than the question of personal friendship. No one who had anything to do with that affair, directly or indirectly, ought to have anything to do with the administration of the Transvaal in the future.”

As I have said before, the Government have adopted the first part of that statement made by Lord Charles Beresford as an excuse for their position, while the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth, in a most eloquent and statesmanlike passage in his speech, urged Her Majesty's Government to adopt Lord Charles Beresford's second point, namely, that those who by implication or suspicion had been associated with the raid and its policy should be withdrawn from dealing further with these problems. The right hon.

Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs made a most important admission in his speech, and that admission practically establishes our case out of his own mouth. He said that the raid had practically destroyed the reform movement in the Transvaal, and that if the raid had not occurred the progressive movement in the Transvaal would have put an end to the domination of President Kruger in a very few years. What more could we wish to have than that statement in order to establish our case, for it admits that a policy of fair play would have stamped out all these conspiracies, would have secured peace, and would have maintained peace throughout the country. The House, no doubt, remembers the well-known words of Mr. Froude in regard to the transfer of the Kimberley diamond mines from the Orange Free State to British control. He described it as "the most discreditable transaction in English Colonial history," and stated that "from that day no Boer in South Africa has been able to trust to English promises." But what was the very first step taken by the Colonial Secretary in dealing with the Transvaal after the raid? Instead of conciliation, instead of meeting President Kruger's magnanimity to the prisoners by concessions, he made a proposal to detach the Rand from the rest of the Transvaal, to give it self government, and to make it a separate community. Could the Transvaal Dutch put any other interpretation upon that proposal than that it was intended to rob the Transvaal of the Rand goldfields as the Orange Free State had been robbed of the Kimberley Diamond Mines?

MR. GEDGE (Walsall): It was only a proposal to create a separate municipality.

*MR. CHANNING: The proposal was quite clear; it gave Home Rule to the Rand with the prospect of gradual detachment from the Transvaal, and it deepened and intensified feeling in that country against the policy of Her Majesty's Government. If the Government were in earnest in pledging themselves to maintain the independence of the Transvaal, why did they not deprive the South Africa Company, which entered into this piratical enterprise, of its charter? I believe the position of the company is exceedingly unsatisfactory, but some of its directors are men of enormous wealth. Why did not the Government instead of shuffling with the question of indemnity, and helping the company to wriggle out of its liability, force it to pay adequate compensation for the outrage it had committed on a country with which we were at peace? Why was the inquiry into the raid shirked and burked, and why was Mr. Rhodes allowed to escape the natural penalty which his participation in the raid justly brought upon him? His resignation of the position of Prime Minister of Cape Colony was wholly insufficient; his name ought to have been struck off the roll of the Privy Council, and he ought to have been put on his trial like Dr. Jameson and his other subordinates, when, on his own admission, he would have to suffer a similar penalty to them. What natural effect had all this on the minds of the people of the Transvaal? A few days ago there was published in the Daily News a striking and interesting interview with Mr. J. B. Robinson, who has special knowledge on these questions. He described in detail a succession of conversations which he had with President Kruger in reference to the raid. I will not quote all the interview, but I will refer to that part of it which is germane to the argument I am advancing. The last occasion on which Mr. Robinson saw President Kruger was after the notorious speech of the Colonial Secretary, in which, with an audacity which I have never seen in any other Member in this House, ventured to state after the Committee had declared Mr. Rhodes guilty of conduct which every honourable man considered dishonourable, that he was free from any suspicion that could affect his personal honour. At that interview President Kruger said—

"Do you mean to tell me as an intelligent man that you accept these statements, and that you believe in them? Do you think we are fools? Do you think for a moment that we do not know the true working of this raid? Do you mean to tell me that you do not know that the men who organised and engineered this raid, organised it for their own benefit, and that they had decided how they would divide the Transvaal, how each of the parties was to have certain interest in this country, and that many of the reformers who were put in gaol were perfectly innocent and ignorant of the schemes of the men who were in the inner circle? There are only twelve men in that inner circle, and they were to share the spoils and divide the Transvaal amongst themselves. They and their companies found the money for the rail. Do you think that we are so innocent as not to know that Mr. Rhodes, metaphorically speaking, held a pistol at the heads of certain men in England and said to them, 'If you do not support me I will denounce you and your complicity in the raid'?"

That showed that President Kruger and his friends firmly believed in the complicity of the Government with the raid. I will not enter into that topic now; it is a topic which hon. Members opposite are obviously extremely reluctant to discuss, but if they had paid close attention to the evidence given before the South Africa Committee they would be able to say, as I say without hesitation, that that evidence has produced an impression upon my own mind which nothing but an absolutely full and adequate inquiry, with convincing disproof of these presumptions, can remove, of the probable complicity of the Colonial Office in the raid. No one can say that the gravest suspicion does not rest upon the Colonial Office, and it is, in my opinion, the moral duty of the Colonial Office, if in its power, to remove that suspicion by further inquiry and absolutely convincing proof. The argument which I am advancing is that the whole of these proceedings after the raid intensified and deepened suspicion in the Transvaal. I am one of those old fashioned people who think that if the raid was illegal and infamous and discreditable for an individual, or a group of individuals, it would be not less infamous and discreditable if carried out by a nation. I believe that a nation and an individual are alike subject to the moral law, and it seems to me it is not an extravagant conception of the present war to hold that it is an official reproduction of the policy of the raid. We have heard a great deal about the Transvaal armaments, but I should like to know, has not a nation the same right as an individual to self-defence? If we are threatened by burglars we have a right to defend ourselves, and if a nation is threatened with extinction, it also has the right to organise its defences. A very striking letter, written by General Joubert to a foreign correspondent, and published in December in one of the foreign papers, refers to this question of armaments, and as, perhaps, it is the most authoritative statement on the subject, I should ask to be permitted to quote it. He writes—

"Since the Jameson invasion, which we happily repulsed in January, 1896, our Government has been convinced that England, under the pressure of not very creditable influences, would sooner or later declare against the Boers a war of extermination. We were likewise persuaded that we could parry this danger only by considerable armaments, and while well aware that the war in question would be severely condemned by all the European peoples, we anticipated that none of them would intervene effectively because they would be so strongly impressed by the loud threats of England and by the armaments of her formidable fleet, that the Great European Powers would not venture to protest against the insatiable thirst of the English for aggrandisement, even if their own interests were thereby to suffer. In these circumstances we had mainly to rely on our own strength. To arm ourselves unremittingly, and to hide these armaments from the English: such was our object."

I think in dealing with these momentous issues of peace and war, and life and death, we ought sometimes to place ourselves in the position occupied by our antagonists. That letter was only to be expected when the Boers had witnessed a long series of events pointing distinctly to a conspiracy to crush their independence. I regret my hon. and learned friend the Member for South Shields is not just now in his place. I have great admiration for his brilliant ability and we all delight in his eloquent expression of the opinions he holds, but I regret to observe in him a disposition to enter into that limited and singular competition of some distinguished lawyers on this side of the House, for the questionable honour of acting as leading counsel for the Colonial Secretary. I envy him neither his case nor his defendant. I was somewhat surprised to hear him develop in this House a number of fallacies which I had the pleasure of exposing to my own satisfaction and to the satisfaction of others in letters to The Times last November. I will not deal with that correspondence, but would illustrate, by one or two points, the unfairness of his contentions. In the first place my hon. and learned friend quoted a speech of President Kruger for the purpose of showing that he had no intention whatever of giving the franchise. The date of that speech was the 30th May, and the final consideration of the seven years Franchise Act was in the last fortnight in July; and—as Mr. Conyngham Greene stated, and as the Blue Books ought to have made known to my hon. and learned friend what were the amendments introduced into that Act, it would have been more reasonable to have quoted what Mr. Greene reported of President Kruger's and General Joubert's speeches during those debates, which showed that President Kruger had the firm intention of giving full and complete action to it. My hon. and learned friend ignored all this, and treated franchise and naturalisation as being at the pleasure of the field cornet; but that again is an error, because the law as finally passed made it compulsory to give the franchise and naturalisation when two responsible citizens had shown by affidavit that the residence was sufficient and that the person concerned had not broken the laws of the Transvaal. In other words, the conditions of naturalisation were pretty much the same as in this country. Another extraordinary theory of my hon. and learned friend was that there was a joint right of occupancy on the part of the Outlanders with the original Dutch—they were not aliens at all. It is obvious that they are aliens exactly as aliens anywhere else, except that rights to reside and trade, and rights to equal taxation were secured to them. But my hon. and learned friend holds that the Convention of 1884 contemplated handing over the Transvaal, not to the Dutch population, with whom Mr. Gladstone was in treaty, but to the whole total population. That I considered an insult to Mr. Gladstone's memory. It is as great an insult as the comparison of the financial motives of the Beits and Ecksteins with the resistance of Hampden and Pym to Ship Money, or the American Colonists to the stamp duty. I do not know whether my hon. and learned friend remembers the history of the annexation of Texas to the United States. That transaction was carried out in a manner somewhat similar to what he suggests, and it was condemned by all men of honour and character in the United States at the time, and remains one of the blackest pages in the history of the aggression of the slave-owning interest in America. My noble friend the Member for the Cricklade Division has been well justified in moving this Amendment. I do not myself wish to treat this question from a party point of view, and I have not so treated it. My remarks have not been party remarks, and I have tried to argue the question on its merits. With regard to this Amendment, however, I think it is not altogether satisfactory, and I agree with much that has fallen from hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite as to the illogical and unsatisfactory support it has received from certain sections of the Liberal party. I do not wish to challenge or condemn the views which other men doubtless hold with sincerity, but it seems to me difficult to understand the position taken up by the hon. Baronet the Member for the Berwick Division and my hon. and learned friend the Member for South Shields. We all know that these hon. Gentlemen and others take their opinions from Lord Rosebery—perhaps that may be an offensive phrase—I will say they are in general agreement with the policy and actions of Lord Rosebery. I think that Lord Rosebery's conception of what he calls Liberal Imperialism—the doctrine of unlimited expansion and that England had a certain moral duty to take the whole world under its control—is a dangerous and disastrous policy for this country. I think that the sober and wise policy which prevailed throughout the century in the times of Sir Robert Peel and of Mr. Gladstone, and until Lord Beaconsfield came forward as an eloquent and almost poetic exponent of this gospel of annexation, was more worthy of support. What is the attitude of Lord Rosebery and his friends with reference to this Amendment? No one has used stronger arguments to hound on the Government into this war than Lord Rosebery, and I cannot understand how that attitude is reconcilable with the support of this Amendment. The hon. Member for the Berwick Division said that he did not wish to reverse the policy of the Government. But if this Amendment means anything it means the condemnation of the whole policy of the Government since 1895, as having led up to and brought about the present disastrous and unsatisfactory war. I care little about the failure, conspicuous enough, of the Government to make proper military preparations and to conduct the war effectively—that is a matter which could be remedied. But the question of policy is the essential issue raised. What I wish to do with the deepest sense of responsibility is to touch what seems to me the real kernel and core of this question. The charge which I have to make is that the policy of the Government in dealing with the grave and serious problem of mixed races in South Africa—a problem tenfold more grave and serious where jealousy, suspicion, and hatred have crept in—has failed. Where I quarrel with the Government is that they have totally failed to grasp and deal with the conditions of that tremendous problem. We know very well the forces that are at work in South Africa. We know what happened with regard to the Kimberley Diamond Mines; they were turned into a strict monopoly, and enormous power was concentrated in the hands of a small syndicate of millionaires. They stretched their power over the goldfields in the Transvaal as soon as they were discovered, and year by year the gold mining interest is more and more concentrated in a few hands. It seems to me a scandalous misuse of the term to refer to the poor unfortunate Government of the Transvaal as an oligarchy. Is a Government an oligarchy which is supported by every man, woman, and child under it with the last drop of their blood? No, Sir; the real oligarchies are these dominating financial syndicates who have far too much power not only in South Africa but in this country. They are a great and terrible danger, and the gravest charge which I bring against the Government is that they have thrown the weight of their influence on the side of this financial oligarchy who are not content with an economic control but now wish to grasp also the whole political machinery of South Africa. We can see the political results in the demand for the suppression of self-government in Cape Colony, a demand which deliberately plays into the hands of the conspirators who desire to dominate South Africa in the interests of capital and not in the interests of the races concerned.

*CAPTAIN PHILLPOTTS (Devon, Torquay): I cannot congratulate the Opposition either on their policy or their patriotism. As to their policy there can be no doubt that the country is heartily sick of the wrangle which is going on in this House, and is anxiously looking forward to the time when the House will proceed to more important business. As to their patriotism, the official Opposition know very well that they cannot turn out the present Government even if they had the will, and the only result of this Amendment will be to make the enemies of the country think that it is divided on the question of the war. In some parts of the country it is the practice to set up a calf's skin stuffed with straw in order to make refractory cows give their milk. The noble Lord who has moved this Amendment occupies that position; he has been set up to attract votes into the lobby, and it would seem from some of the speeches that that operation will be successful. The hon. Baronet the Member for the Berwick Division taunted the Government with having brought forward the excuse that they were wise after the event. Here is an extract from a speech made by one who was wise before the event, the Leader of the Opposition, on the 17th of October, in this House—

"Now, Sir, I am glad that the Government are at least not falling into an error that has not infrequently been made by our countrymen in the past times, and that they are sending out—after some delay, it is true, an ample force for the purpose of effectually prosecuting and concluding this enterprise. The difficulties there are such that they will try to the utmost both the courage and endurance of the soldier and the skilled general. We have the most complete confidence in our men and our officers, and we know that these difficulties will be successfully encountered."

Having delivered that speech, the Leader of the Opposition will now, I suppose, deliver a speech in support of this Amendment and vote for it. On former occasions the right hon. Gentleman has spoken in one way and voted in another. The Opposition are taunting Her Majesty's Government and their supporters with having made insufficient preparation for the war. A taunt of that kind can only be compared with Satan reproving sin. What has been the policy of the Liberal party for generations past but to cut down the defensive armaments of the country, and to the sacrifice of efficiency to expediency whenever they had an opportunity of doing so? The Government undoubtedly made mistakes, but the greatest mistake they were ever guilty of was that they did not, when they came into power, come down to the House and tell the country the lamentable state in which they found the defensive forces of the Empire, and the defective condition of the artillery. It has been said that if you allow weeds to grow one year it takes seven years to eradicate them, and I say that for one year that the last Government was in office it would take several years to correct the mischief they have done. Certain members of the Government have been accused of making rash speeches. Well, the members of Her Majesty's Government are not the only people who make rash speeches. Many of the supporters of the Government have done so, and I for one plead guilty to making a rash statement, in addressing my constituents. I praised up certain members of the Opposition for their patriotism and statesmanlike support of the Government in their difficulties; and I was rash enough to name the hon. Baronet the Member for the Berwick Division amongst others. I know better now. I do not think that all those hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who have spoken in favour of supporting the Government will stultify themselves by going into the Opposition lobby. I hope they will not prove that if you scratch a patriotic Liberal Imperialist you will only find an unpatriotic partisan. Some Members opposite have offered to Her Majesty's Government conditional promises of support. No doubt Her Majesty's Government will be properly grateful for that support, but I hope at the same time that the Government and the Whips will not rely too much on it, for if they do they may find that though the political flag of truce has been hoisted, that they are exposed to a galling fire. I trust they will look out, and not be caught napping in that respect. It has been said that the result of the war will be to accentuate the differences that exist between the Dutch and the British races in South Africa. I do not believe in that for one moment. The Dutch have been opposed to the British mainly because they held them in contempt, although there were other reasons also; but after this war, whatever else may happen, they will have learned to respect Englishmen. If the Government of this country had not come forward to support the undoubted rights of the English in South Africa we should have lost the support of our colonies, and led to the breaking up of the British Empire. The effect of this Amendment can only have a bad influence on the country, and lead our enemies to believe that we are disunited. They will look at what has occurred in the House, and at the result of the division if a division takes place. But the heart of the country is sound, and I think that hon. Members opposite will find in the time to come when they go before their constituents that in making these Little Englander speeches they have made a political mistake. The hon. Gentleman opposite who spoke last seemed to find some difficulty in pronouncing the word "loyalty." I am not surprised; I would be very much surprised if I thought he had any experience of that sentiment, judging from his speech.

*MR. CHANNING: What I said was that the colonies did not render their help merely from the sentiment of loyalty, but spontaneously and of goodwill.

*CAPTAIN PHILLPOTTS: That is my case. Loyalty was the mainspring of their action. I think the hon. Gentleman gave the whole of his case away when he showed the vast preparations that had been made by the Transvaal Government for the present war. I think it is necessary for everyone of us who has the welfare of the country at heart to support the Government in the arduous task that they have undertaken.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): The Amendment which this House has been engaged in discussing since Tuesday last is a somewhat peculiar one, and I have been requested by the Irish Nationalist Members to explain why it is that they find themselves unable to vote for it. It consists of two portions. The first part proposes to censure the Government for the want of knowledge, foresight, prudence, and judgment in the conduct of the negotiations in South African affairs since 1895. Although I should have wished to have seen that portion of the Amendment so drafted as to raise a clearer issue as to the justice and necessity of the war, still, as far as I am concerned, and as far as most of my colleagues are concerned, had the Amendment been confined to that portion we would have gladly supported it. But when we turn to the second portion of the Amendment, we see that while it is proposed to censure the Government for their want of knowledge, foresight, and judgment in their preparation for the war now proceeding, we are constrained to interpret the second portion of the Amendment into practically a declaration that the Government ought to have made better preparation, and that the war ought to be prosecuted to victory. Believing as we do that the war is unjust—one of the cruellest and most unjust ever undertaken in history—believing, as we do, that it is an unprovoked war, and a war of aggression, we find it impossible to support the Amendment. I think the overwhelming majority of our Irish people regard this war as unjust, and entirely unnecessary, and we are convinced on the evidence, and on the merits, that this war has been the work of a ring of unscrupulous capitalists, that the reasons and pretexts which have been put forward to justify it have in truth nothing whatever to do with the cause of it, and that the inmost purpose of this narrow ring of capitalists is to rob a people against whom this country has no just right of complaint, and to rob them because in their territory, unhappily for them, there has been discovered the richest goldfield in the world. Holding that belief firmly it would be impossible for the representatives of Ireland with any show of honesty to vote for an Amendment which seems to blame the Government for not making greater preparations to carry on the war to its iniquitous and cruel termination. I might almost conclude without further explanation, but there are two points which have not been much alluded to in the course of the debate to which I desire briefly to refer. Last autumn and spring the chief explanation put forward as a justification of the war were the grievances of the Uitlanders. But we hear very little now of these grievances. They have vanished into the background. I remember hearing the Colonial Secretary declaring that this country was fighting to set free from their grievances not only the British Uitlanders, but the Uitlanders of every nationality of Europe. I challenge the Government to say to-day whether it is not the fact that in the army of the Transvaal and Free State Republics, there are not twice as many Uitlanders fighting as on the British side. [An HON. MEMBER: Four times as many.] Yes, perhaps, four times as many. It is no wonder that the grievances of the Uitlanders have disappeared from the case of the Government when they find that there are Scandinavians, French, and German Uitlanders spilling their blood in defence of the country, to which the British Government, we were told, was going to give freedom. I have not the least intention of going into details on these matters, but I emphasise the fact that, up to this hour, no honest, straightforward answer has been given to the question often propounded in this House and the country—"What are we fighting for?" Different answers have been given. I will only quote one, because it appears to me one of the true causes, as well as a sinister statement. Speaking in London on the 18th December the First Lord of the Admiralty used this language—

"The appeal comes to us from the Cape, sweep back the invader; let it be known throughout South Africa that it is the British race which is the predominant race, and intends to remain the predominant race."

[HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!] I am glad the First Lord of the Admiralty stated that in an unguarded moment. Yes, that sentiment is cheered, and that is what you call liberty and equal rights for all. We know from long and bitter experience what that means. Predominant race! that is what you are fighting for—to put the Dutch under your feet in South Africa; but allow me to tell you you will never succeed. It is an infamous object; the conscience of humanity will be against you in this struggle, and although for a time you may beat down these people by overwhelming numbers, you are but creating for yourselves, as a result of this war, far away in the Southern Seas, 7,000 miles from your shores, another Ireland, which will be infinitely more difficult to hold down than the Ireland which is so close. Now, I desire to say a few words on a subject on which I feel very keenly, namely, the attacks that have been made on Sir W. Butler. This subject is closely concerned with the principles on which the Amendment is based, and I shall honestly endeavour to approach the consideration of it from the point of view, not of an Irishman, but of a member of the House of Commons, who desires to see fair play done to everybody. Now what is the exact state of the case in regard to Sir W. Butler? He, a distinguished soldier of the Queen, was in military command in South Africa when war became imminent. His resignation from that command was accepted by the Government, and it is idle to tell me that the acceptance of the resignation of a commanding officer in a distant country, on the eve of war, is not a very serious matter for that officer, all the more especially if there be truth, as I believe there is truth, in the statement that his resignation was in consequence of communications, more or less in the nature of a censure, which reached him from the Colonial Office or from the War Office—but from the Colonial Office, I think. When a question was put the other day to the Secretary of State for War why it was, when Sir W. Butler had been made the object of an unheard-of torrent of abuse and vituperation, that he had not defended his subordinate—we should all remember, and British officers opposite should remember, that the position of a soldier is particularly cruel, because his mouth is shut by the rules of the Service; and it is the bounden duty of his political superiors to defend his character when attacked, or, if they cannot defend it, to retire him—what was the answer of the Secretary of State for War?—

“All I can say is that if the head of a department which, as the noble Lord knows himself, is somewhat hard-worked, even in ordinary times, were to take upon himself in a time like that through which we have been passing, to reply to every attack in the press on himself, or on his subordinates, he would not have much leisure left for the legitimate work of his office.”

I say that was a mean and evasive answer. His Lordship levelled the case down to an ordinary criticism of subordinates who are not resigning their position—to the ordinary kind of criticism to which we are all subject in the press of the country. Is that a fair answer in regard to a soldier placed in the peculiar circumstances in which Sir W. Butler was situated, and who, when he resigned, was subjected to a tempest of outrage absolutely unparalleled in my memory? What were the charges made against him? He was said to be superseded because he had betrayed his duty as a soldier, and allowed his political opinions to overcome his sense of duty to the Queen and to the Army; that he had not sent to the Government proper information as to the condition of affairs in South Africa and the resources of the enemy; and furthermore, that he had used his position in South Africa to block and obstruct the defences of the frontier of the colony. Now we have had a statement from the Under Secretary for War in this House that there is not a shadow of a shade, not a shred of justification for all this storm of vituperation and insult, for we are told that the Government had all the information they desired to guide them, that they believed it to be quite true, and that not a single word had been uttered by the Government that they had any cause to complain of Sir W. Butler in regard to the defences of the colony. Is it the way in which a soldier should be treated by his superiors, to be left unsheltered against the outrages hurled against him for three or four months, and no justification given by his superiors, until that justification is dragged out unwillingly in the House of Lords? And then we see the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War comparing the case of the resignation of Sir W. Butler to that of any subordinate, or even to the Marquess of Lansdowne, who if he had resigned would not have had his mouth shut, though a Member of the Cabinet, but would have been released from his oath of secrecy, when he could come down to the House of Lords to give his explanation. Further, there is a matter which requires very careful consideration and investigation. We were told by the First Lord of the Treasury that the sole cause of the acceptance of Sir W. Butler's resignation was a difference of opinion with Sir Alfred Milner in regard to politics. It may be said, “What business had Sir W. Butler, who is a soldier, to interfere in politics? He ought to have left politics alone.” But we know perfectly well that owing to the peculiarity of his position in the Cape, he was transferred from the position of a simple soldier to that of High Commissioner, and it became his duty then to send home political despatches. What was done with these despatches? The history of the treatment of these despatches is one of the most infamous things connected with the whole of these transactions. While voluminous quotations from the Cape Times, occupying whole pages of the Blue-books, were sent home by Sir A. Milner in support of the alleged conspiracy against England, Sir W. Butler was denied a hearing for his despatches, which are still suppressed, with the exception of one, giving his opinion of the operations of the South African League. That is to say, the hell-hounds of the South African League were set against Sir W. Butler, while his arguments were completely suppressed, and his mouth shut. There are one or two questions which ought to be asked, which have not been pressed by Irish Members, but by certain of the newspaper press, although I notice these have become pretty silent since Parliament met. I think, however, that we are justified in pressing for some further details as to the plans of defence which Sir W. Butler laid before the Government before he gave up military employment in South Africa. The Secretary of State for War said in the House of Lords—

“There were despatches, no doubt, containing plans of defence for the Colonies—plans of considerable minuteness—and for that very reason I object to presenting to Parliament Papers containing very confidential matter, and which, moreover, it is not usual to present to Parliament.”

If that is so, the whole press of the country ought not to have been allowed unchecked and unproved by the Government to charge this soldier with betraying his country by his arrangements for the defence of the Colonies. It has been asserted, and it is believed by many people, that one of the recommendations of Sir W. Butler was that, in the case of war, no attempt should be made to garrison the colony of Natal north of the Tugela river. We are entitled to know whether that is true or not.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): No such thing. It is not true.

MR. DILLON: One of the causes of the “entanglement” at Ladysmith, which the First Lord of the Treasury says was the source and root of all the disasters to the British, was the reckless promise given on the 25th May, 1899, by Sir Alfred Milner to the Government of Natal. When the Governor of Natal spoke to the Prime Minister, and asked him to pledge himself to a policy of war, the Prime Minister said he was afraid to do so, because it would militate against the interests of Natal if the British Government withdrew after all. Then Sir A. Milner wired—

“You can tell Minister that it is out of the question that any invasion of Natal should be tolerated by Her Majesty's Government. Such an event is highly improbable, I think, but Natal would be defended with the whole force of the Empire.”

And that promise was endorsed by a special telegram from the Colonial Secretary. That most reckless promise was given for the purpose of conciliating the military authorities afterwards. Is it not time for Ministers to cease saying that there has been no interference between the military and political authorities? That promise was given for the purpose of obtaining from Natal the support of the war policy, which up to that time the Government of Natal had refused to give. They were in favour of peace. On that reckless promise the Government of Natal declared for the war policy. That promise has not been kept, and could not be kept. It was given for an evil purpose, but in the attempt to keep it all the disasters which have overtaken the British Army have been brought about. That was the first of these movements which appear to me to have been made in pursuit of the same evil policy. The second of the movements was made on 22nd September last. To the astonishment of all South Africa a large body of troops moved out to Glencoe, in the teeth of the advice of the most skilled military advisers of the Ministry, and with this result, that on the day after these troops were moved commandeering was commenced in the Transvaal. On the 22nd September the Governor of Natal, Sir W. Hely-Hutchinson, telegraphed to Sir Alfred Milner that according to the best information he had received the Boers would not invade Natal or declare war unless the troops were moved to Glencoe; but if troops were moved to Glencoe the Boers would accept the challenge. On the evening of the 23rd a message came from the Colonial Secretary giving the text of the dispatch of September 22nd, and in the teeth of his own opinion given on that very day, and on the advice of our representative in Natal, on that very day they accepted the despatch of September 22nd as a declaration on the part of the Home Government that war was certain. And The Times correspondent on that day declared that “the movement of troops to Glencoe gave to the war party in Pretoria the excuse they were looking for and decided the balance in favour of war.” Well, there may have been a war party in Pretoria; but from all my reading of this transaction I am convinced that neither President Kruger nor his advisers belonged to the war party. I am certain that there was a war party nearer home. That movement of troops was intended by those who pulled the strings to force the hands of the Boers. If there were any doubt as to the existence of this war party in Pretoria I would just quote from a private conversation between Mr. Smutz and Mr. Conyngham Greene—

“When we parted he (Mr. Greene) entertained a strong hope that a settlement would be arrived at on the proposed basis, and strict secrecy was alone necessary, as the party would be against a settlement if they came to hear of it.”

And they did come to hear of it. That conversation took place a fortnight before the troops were moved to Glencoe, and they immediately took steps to frustrate a possible settlement. If it had not been for the position of Sir William Butler I would not enter into this question at such length. This is a shameful war and the conscience of all civilised mankind is against it; and although it is considered on that Bench to be fashionable to speak with contempt of the opinion of Europe, they will find in the long run that it is an expensive position to occupy. They will find when the opinion of Europe is unanimous in a matter of this kind the issue may be serious. Already England has suffered defeats and disasters greater than any in her history since the revolt of the American colonies. The military prestige of England is irretrievably ruined. [Laughter.] You laugh at that sentiment. You laugh at the opinion of military experts; but I say it will take you two generations to recover your military prestige. When I heard the Colonial Secretary describe the military preparations, and that you were putting 200,000 men into the field to conquer what you put at the outside as 50,000 farmers, I think it is a pretty condition of things that you have brought England to, for you are publishing to the world that it takes four Englishmen to meet one Boer. The international position of England is worse and lower than it has been at any time throughout the century. You watch now without a word of protest while Russia calmly absorbs Persia, a state of things which last year would have been regarded as a national crisis. Suppose after enormous sacrifices you bring this war to a successful issue—and I have no doubt it will be possible for you to do so—suppose you break down the resistance of this small people, where will you be then? You will have to maintain an enormous army in that country for a long period. The Colonial Secretary says this war will produce peace, and love, and mutual respect; but in the meantime we are realising, by the many desolate homes in England, that it is going to be a very expensive luxury. You are trying to trample these people down and to deprive them of that liberty which they have won through two generations of blood and tears, and which they prize more highly than life itself. I would remind you of examples in the history of the world where small peoples have brought great empires into difficulties which have influenced the whole tide of their future, and animated by some lofty impulse, it has served to inspire them, and the generations which have come after them; and I tell you now, as I believe it firmly, that it is beyond the power of this great and mighty Empire to deprive these people of their liberty, because by the splendid stand they have made they have asserted a claim to liberty and freedom which no amount of brute strength will ever crush. You may trample them down by your innumerable hosts; but the conscience of mankind will be against you. These people will rise and rise again, and my conviction is that even if you conquer the Transvaal the ultimate result will be the loss of South Africa to England.

*MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): No one who heard the speech of the Colonial Secretary this evening could have helped admiring its force, its ability, and its effectiveness. Never, I think, has he addressed this House with such energy; never has he displayed such debating power. And it is no wonder, Mr. Speaker, that he should be moved to a great effort on this occasion. He had to vindicate the nation; he had to vindicate the Government; and, above all, he had to vindicate himself. He expressed in eloquent terms the sense of responsibility that is upon him, and no one who has any human sympathy can deny some fellow-feeling in reflecting what a burden now lies upon the Colonial Secretary. Be it for glory or for condemnation this is his war. It may be, as he says, that it was inevitable. I shall deal with that presently. I do not believe it. Putting aside the statement and looking upon this as a matter of statesmanship, which might be dealt with as any other question arising in the course of our history, I ask hon. Members to consider candidly for themselves whether, in their own minds, they do not confess that if any other member of the Cabinet than the right hon. Gentleman had been at the Colonial Office, there would have been no war. We had a Conservative Ministry in power from 1885 to 1892, with the exception of a few months in 1886, and the Colonial Minister of those years maintained peace in South Africa. There was no peril of war pending then. It may have been a mistake on the then Colonial Secretary's part not to accept the inevitable; but he at all events staved off the evil hour which the present occupier of the Colonial Office has chosen to accept. I am not saying it is his fault, or that history will record it to his condemnation. But the responsibility for good or evil—for the present war, rests upon himself. The right hon. Gentleman takes comfort in the reflection that at the present time he is supported by the mass of the nation. I do not question the accuracy of that statement. Most sorrowfully I admit it to be true. But is that any final criterion of judgment? Lord North was supported by the mass of the nation, but what do we think of Lord North now? To come down to our own time the Crimean War was also supported by the mass of the nation. Prominent members of Parliament who opposed that war lost their seats in consequence, and were exposed not infrequently to personal insult. I believe Mr. Bright's effigy was burned in Lancashire for his opposition to the national will, and yet the present Prime Minister has told us that the nation then put its money on the wrong horse. That the nation supports the Government at this moment may be a great comfort to the Colonial Secretary, but the fact offers no abiding security. That glory may pass away as many similar glories have passed away, and the statesman who is idolised by his generation may be regarded by subsequent generations as a man who made a colossal mistake and exposed his country to a colossal misfortune. The right hon. Gentleman said that the war was an inevitable war, and he seemed to hint that some of his predecessors had been weak in attempting to postpone the calamity. Boer and Briton exist side by side in South Africa. In no other way than by war could the difficulty be solved which should be uppermost. Other suggestions have been tried, no doubt, from time to time; other policies have been adopted by other Ministers. The Colonial Secretary said they had failed, as they were sure to fail. This necessity of a contest, of a bloody contest of war, arose as the only way of solving the question which should be supreme. I do not recognise the necessity of either being supreme. Then, it is said, the policy of magnanimity failed. Magnanimity! The very word betrays an underlying fault. The Boer, I am told by those who know him best, teaches us this lesson. Treat him as a friend and an equal, and he will be staunch and true to you in all the relations of life. But let him suspect that you are endeavouring to be his superior, let the knowledge of your intended mastery be made manifest in your action and you will find him not the friend you might have made him, nor the servant or inferior you wished him to be. That is the case here. But as to this policy of magnanimity, Mr. Speaker. Let us clear our minds of cant. Hon. Members think it is our noble action after Majuba. ["Gladstone!"] Oh, I am not going to let Mr. Gladstone, any more than the Colonial Secretary, alone. We took away self government from the Transvaal in 1877. The Transvaal remonstrated, and their wrongs were taken up in England by the Liberal party. Mr. Gladstone went down to Midlothian and denounced the occupation of the Transvaal. He said in words which must be weighed to be realised and understood, that "if the Transvaal was as valuable as it was valueless he would have nothing to do with it." I could not, if I would, search all the speeches of the Colonial Secretary, but I suspect that those who take the trouble will find that in the speeches, before 1880, he denounced in the same way the seizure of the Transvaal. What happened? The Liberal party came into office in the spring of 1880, and the Boers looked for the redress of this wrong they had suffered. They got no redress, and in December the Boers rose in arms. Then it was that this policy of magnanimity prevailed and the Transvaal was restored. What is the magnanimity of restoring that which has been stolen, which was not restored on grounds of justice, but only after we get a knock on the head? There is no magnanimity in it. The Colonial Secretary said that the policy of magnanimity had failed. If there was no magnanimity in it the policy of magnanimity could not have failed. But even in the end when the Government did make restitution they did not restore exactly what they took away. They put qualifications in the restitution which the Boers at the time protested against, and said they would never sit down quietly under; and they attempted from that time downwards to recover the position they held before the seizure of the Transvaal, and to be put back in the same position as the Orange Free State. Incomplete and tardy, as it was, the policy which was carried out in the restitution of the Transvaal had not failed. On the one side there had been resentment, and on the other side presumption. These feelings survived amongst some in South Africa, but they were never shared by responsible men in authority. One of the last declarations made by Mr. Kruger last summer with reference to this act of Mr. Gladstone in restoring the Transvaal was a recognition of the admirable, statesmanlike, Christian spirit [ironical laughter] which was shown in restoring the Transvaal, when the English Government had it in its power to withhold it by force of arms. I noticed that an hon. Member laughed when I suggested that Paul Kruger had spoken of this restitution as an illustration of Christian spirit. Is it the feeling that Paul Kruger is nothing but a canting hypocrite. ["No, No!"]

*CAPTAIN PHILLPOTTS: I laughed because I thought it was very ridiculous to suppose that Mr. Kruger ever imagined that the Transvaal was given back from any Christian motive.

*MR. COURTNEY: It is not worth while pursuing the discussion on that point; but what can be ridiculous in supposing that an act of Mr. Gladstone was animated by Christian spirit? Well, I was saying when this diversion took place that the restitution of the Transvaal did not fail; because for years the Transvaal went on without causing us any real disturbance; and as far as these vital elements of conflict upon which the Colonial Secretary dwelt are concerned, be it observed they are not confined to the inhabitants of the Transvaal State. They are between the Boers and the British, and not the Boers of the South African Republic alone. They extend to the Boers in the Free State, Cape Colony, and Natal, as well as to the Boers in the Transvaal. I say that the whole history of the movement is foreign to the suggestion that there was any diversity of races such as to make it inevitable that a war between the two peoples should ensue. Look at the facts upon which he relies to prove his theory. The Colonial Secretary has cited the incursion of the Boers from the north which had to be repelled by Sir Charles Warren. But did the action on the part of the British Government excite any resentment on the part of the Dutch in Cape Colony and Natal or on the part of the Free State?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes, certainly.

*MR. COURTNEY: I should like to see the evidence of it.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: As the right hon. Gentleman appeals to me, I am obliged to inform him as to the historical fact. It is the fact that there was a serious agitation in the colony, and Sir John Brand, who was at that time President of the Orange Free State, informed Her Majesty's Government that, if the operations proceeded, there would be the greatest difficulty in restraining the Orange Free State.

*MR. COURTNEY: Sir John Brand was President of the Free State, and that is why he acted in the way he did, and showed that there was no irreconcilable feud. Well, now, I pass to the next point. The right hon. Gentleman has quoted the question of the drifts as another evidence of that irreconcilable feud. But in that question the Dutch Ministry at the Cape was on the English side; and so was the Free State. They were both on our side, and the influence of both brought about a peaceful settlement of that dispute. I do not want to go through the painful history in detail, but who can deny that at all events the recent negotiations presented again and again opportunities of peace incompatible with the notion of a war, which might be postponed, but could not be averted. Throughout the summer the Cape Ministry, Mr. Steyn, Mr. Fischer, and Mr. Hofmeyr did their best to maintain peace, and I will go further and assert that Paul Kruger himself did his best to maintain peace. The hon. and learned Member for South Shields, in that ingenious speech the other day, argued that President Kruger could not have meant to make any concession, because he had told his provincial burghers that he would not give up the control of the State to foreigners. If the effect of the changes which statesmen inaugurated were to be judged by their statements to some of their supporters before the changes were made, what was to be said of Mr. Disraeli and the Franchise Act of 1867? Before his Bill had made any progress Mr. Disraeli and the late last Lord Derby made declarations exactly similar in spirit to that quoted by the hon. and learned Member for South Shields. But Mr. Disraeli and Lord Derby were statesmen whose action was shaped and moulded in relation to the forces with which they had to deal, and, before they had gone far, they had so far departed from their original statements that Lord Salisbury seceded from the Government and moved entirely away. Paul Kruger is a statesman, and whatever he may have said beforehand, he found himself constrained to agree to a seven years franchise, and the Act was passed and is now the Law. And when we are told that this war was inevitable, I ask how the Colonial Secretary can reconcile it with the Act that was passed in which he himself saw a basis for further action, and in reference to which he proposed a commission of inquiry. The failure of that Act as a settlement cannot be charged against Paul Kruger, and cannot be charged against the Transvaal Government, but is due to the abrupt termination of the negotiations by the Colonial Secretary. And again, in respect to the five years, what is the mystery of the acceptance which was no acceptance? The hon. Member for East Mayo has spoken of a sinister influence being at work to prevent the negotiations begun being successfully carried through. However that may be, I do remember that when the negotiations broke down, and the opportunity for peace was lost, The Times newspaper rejoiced that the peril of peace had passed away. That was the view of the organ which on this subject represents public opinion. I do not deny it. That was the avowed opinion of The Times. ("No.") There is no use denying it; the file of the paper is in the library. So far from accepting the theory of the Colonial Secretary that there is a feud which cannot be reconciled, that there is a struggle between the two races which was bound to end in war, I say that war has been precipitated through the miscarriage of diplomacy in the Colonial Office. It is upon that that the fatal issue of war has arisen. Those who have come to that conclusion are bound to proclaim this truth. Though they may be in a minority in the House and in the country, this proves nothing as to what the opinion of the future will be. And whether in a minority large or small, those who have this conviction deep within their hearts as to the origin of the war—who recognise the awful destruction of life and property, international peace, and the terrible future that is before them in South Africa—cannot remain silent under that conviction. It is our bounden duty to endeavour to convert the country to our view of the war. In one thing I do agree with the Colonial Secretary, who said—and I think that it was very significant—that he believed the majority of the Liberal Members opposite held this war to be unnecessary and, therefore, unjust. I agree with the Colonial Secretary in thinking that that is the view of the majority of the Liberal Members; and I believe, when the time comes for testing the question, it will be found that the majority of the electors also hold that view. Holding this opinion I am not enamoured of the present Amendment. I think the Liberal party have not done themselves any good in the course which they have taken in adopting it. They have weakened their own position in order to co-operate with a minority holding views absolutely opposed to their own. We have the hon. Member for the Berwick Division holding that the war was most necessary, when the majority of the Liberal party held the view that the war was unnecessary and unjust. Yet they have joined together, with the result that the majority are really held back by a minority. But it may be said that this is a domestic matter, and I admit that it might be said that these criticisms of mine should be resented as impertinent. But it is the view which I hold, and it touches upon the vital question to which I have devoted myself—the cardinal proposition that the war is unnecessary. By speeches in the House and out of it, and by writings, we should try to bring home to the people the conviction, which I am sure in the long run will prevail, that this war is an unnecessary calamity. It is bad enough to have to realise the evil as it is, but what is that which is going to follow? We are in a dreadful position—a position which the Prime Minister spoke of as one of humiliation. We have the spectacle of Britain's military arm being used not only for an unnecessary and therefore also, as the Colonial Secretary would say, an unjust war, but being used to such little effect that the reputation, force, and value of the military arm is, for a time at least, diminished. "Then," the Colonial Secretary said, "you are in favour of stopping the war at once." I am in favour of seizing the first opportunity of stopping the war upon a secure basis, but I recognise what the Colonial Secretary apparently refused to recognise, that there are many elements in the bringing about of war. Although I think this war is unnecessary, although I think the responsibility is upon my right hon. friend, and that it is to be attributed to his diplomacy, not even that diplomacy could have brought it about without some contributory elements on the other side. The position of the enemy in our colony is, of course, one which must be repelled; but let this be done and then the first care of those who are convinced that the war is unnecessary must be directed in action, as it is now in thought to the methods by which peace could be re-established. I do not accuse the Government or the Colonial Secretary of having brought about this war for the love of war. Far from it. The great reason for the military mess into which we have got is that they never expected war. They thought a mere show of force would be sufficient. They were betrayed into the mistake because the Colonial Secretary especially had taken as his authority—Sir Alfred Milner had helped to confirm him—the opinions of Mr. Rhodes as the man best acquainted with the conditions of life in South Africa. Mr. Rhodes's want of knowledge of South Africa is strange after so many years of residence there.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The statement which my right hon. friend makes has been made again and again and has been again and again contradicted. Since the time of the raid I have had no communication with Mr. Rhodes in reference to political affairs in South Africa, either directly or indirectly.

*MR. COURTNEY: I have not the least hesitation in accepting that statement. It does not affect what I say. I do not say that he had an interview with Mr. Rhodes and got his instructions from him. I never dreamt that. I was saying that Mr. Rhodes, with all his knowledge of South Africa, showed his intense ignorance of the character and the tenacity of the Boer in that raid which he started. Mr. Rhodes has again, in the course of this year, shown his intense ignorance of the character of the people amongst whom he had dwelt by saying in the Cape Parliament that Mr. Kruger would climb down, that he would not fight, and that the Republic would be soon a thing of the past. And, if I am not misinformed, Mr. Rhodes showed his ignorance of Boer character and action by being at Kimberley at this moment; for he did not go there to show how a millionaire could stand the siege, but on his way to Bulawayo, which he thought he would reach without interruption. Now what I am suggesting is that my right hon. friend, studying as he must, with the assistance of Sir Alfred Milner, the probabilities of the war in South Africa which has broken out, was misled by such public utterances. He is misled in the same way now. He believes, fortified by the same authority, that if the Boers are once beaten they will live afterwards in the most quiet and friendly fashion with those who have beaten them. Mr. Rhodes has made another public utterance that the Boers would sit down quietly after defeat. This last opinion is, however, not what may be called the opinion of the English party in South Africa. They have shown by their articles in the newspapers and in the letters and telegrams sent home, and by correspondence in the papers that they do not believe in the idea of working out the redemption of South Africa, at all events for a long time to come, by the theory of equal rights. You can do either one thing or another. You may govern the Republics as Crown Colonies, or you may disfranchise the majority of the Dutch, or you may try to jerrymander the electoral divisions, somehow or other the end must be secured so that the British section shall have political predominance over the Boers. They tell you that unless that is done there can be no peace. It is idle to think the problem can be solved on the simple theory of equal political rights, because, as the Natal newspaper says, short of extermination you will never be able to alter the fact—for a long time to come, if ever—that the Dutch are more numerous than the English inhabitants of South Africa. Then you are landed in this proposition, and this is the threatened future which may well stimulate those who hold the belief that I do as to the unnecessary character of this war. If you attain military success, which you may doubtless do if you are not interrupted, and spend all your labour in the effort, the end of it all will be the government of South Africa by an English garrison. We know by bitter experience what that means. We know what it has been in Ireland.

MR. DILLON: Why did you oppose Home Rule?

*MR. COURTNEY: For nearly a century we have been trying to undo the evil system of governing Ireland through an English garrison. We know what it was in Canada. In Canada it has been given up, entirely abandoned, and peace is established. The attempt to govern South Africa through an English garrison will mean endless trouble and endless evil, and the consummation of the wrong of the war will be complete if it precipitates the establishment of such a system, from which I, at all events, recoil.

MR. BECKETT (Yorkshire N.R., Whitby): I wonder, Sir, if the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down is quite satisfied with the cheers which greeted him on rising. He said perfectly truly that popular opinion in England was on the side of the Ministry, and from historical precedents he seemed to imply that the opinion of posterity would be on his side. I venture to doubt whether the opinion of posterity is more accurately reflected in the voices of those who cheered his speech than it is in view of the mass of the people of England. The right hon. Gentleman is the champion of lost causes and unpopular policies, but though his advocacy of President Kruger is able, eloquent, and courageous, I doubt very much whether it is an omen of the ultimate success of the cause he supports. He has compared this conflict with that which we undertook against our American Colonies. But the two wars were totally different. At that time, England went to war to compel the American Colonies to submit to a state which, in the words of Lord Chatham, would have been a state of servitude. We are now engaged in a war to release our fellow-subjects from a state of servitude. He further said that the policy of restitution had not failed, but in an earlier part of his speech he said with perfect truth that since that policy of restitution—he did not use the words, but since 1884—we had never ceased to have trouble in South Africa. These troubles were undoubtedly due to the policy of restitution which we adopted in 1881. Everybody who has followed the course of this debate will see that all that has been said resolves itself into two charges against the Government. One charge is that they made a war which might have been avoided, and the other is that they did not sufficiently prepare against the chance and possibility of war. As to the first of those charges, I think the discussion absolutely barren and fruitless, because no matter how much we may debate it it will always remain a matter which cannot be settled by argument. It is purely a matter of opinion, and by this time each man has formed his opinion, and is not likely to change it. We have to recognise that it is now our duty to deal with things as they are and not with things as they might or might not have been. As to the war being inevitable, I do not suppose that anyone would say that either President Kruger or the Colonial Secretary, in his most bellicose mood, would look upon war except as a means to an end, and would not if he could gladly secure that end without resorting to the force of arms. Two facts arise unmistakably out of the mass of argument and assertion which has this matter for its subject-ground, the first being that the Bloemfontein Conference was hailed with acclaim by all parties, and the second that at that Conference the negotiations were set on foot which ultimately resulted in war. From those two facts we draw three conclusions. The first is that the differences between the British and the Boer Governments had arrived at so critical a stage that it was the general opinion that some extraordinary means of dealing with them should be devised. The second is that everybody hoped and many expected that by this means a peaceful settlement would be arrived at. The third is that as a peaceful settlement was not arrived at it is reasonable to conclude that there was, underlying the differences of opinion, a principle which both sides believed they could not concede with either honour or safety. These negotiations failed. They failed, and we are at war because we demanded equal rights and fair treatment and just government for British subjects in the Transvaal. The Boers are at war because they believed they could not grant these things without forfeiting their independence. If they are justified we are justified, because each of us believed we had in view an end that was righteous and just in itself, and of supreme and vital importance to our continued existence in the positions we respectively occupied, the one as an independent State and the other as a paramount Power. The more pressing question is this. Is it true that the Government did not make sufficient preparations against a war which seemed the possible if not the probable outcome of the negotiations upon which they were engaged? What is the duty of a Government engaged in negotiations which are not unlikely to end in war? They call for their military advisers; they ask them to prepare a plan of campaign; they ask them to decide the number, equipment and disposition of the forces, so that if war should break out it would not find them unprepared. A further duty of the Government is to place all the resources of the country at the disposal of the generals, and to take every means in their power to assist the operations in the field. In these important, essential, and vital matters can anyone say that the Government have been guilty of any delinquency? It is true that when things went wrong they began with one accord to make excuses, and that was the time when they made their mistakes, because it was their excuses that made a vote of censure possible and provided their enemies with the means for an effective attack. Until the eloquent and notable speech of the Under Secretary of State for War the country was not aware of the strong case that could be presented on behalf of the Government. What is more, some Ministers treated this question, of the greatest possible importance, with a calm indifference that shocked and offended the country. If the First Lord of the Treasury were present I would earnestly entreat him to remember that if, as he told us the other night, he takes no interest in his speeches himself, the country does, and at such a crisis as the present it looks to him for light and guidance and counsel and encouragement. Whatever the Government may have said, they undoubtedly did the right thing. They scrupulously followed the advice of their military advisers, and left their generals an absolutely free hand in the field. Even as regards this "unhappy entanglement" at Ladysmith, from which all our difficulties and troubles have sprung, what is the position of the Government? A most able and competent general said that to hold Laing's Nek, not Ladysmith alone, and the whole of the country safe from invasion, we should require an addition to the present strength of troops of a total of about 5,600 men. The Government sent not only 5,600, but double that number, and therefore they might reasonably conclude that the country was safe from invasion. Neither the Government of Natal nor the Prime Minister of Natal ever expressed the opinion that Sir William Symons's estimate was below the mark. As it turned out the estimate was ludicrously wrong, but surely the Government are not to blame for that. What more could they do than take the opinion and advice of the most competent men they could find—the men actually on the spot? If we leave the question of Ladysmith and refer to the total number of forces in South Africa, the Government are not on such firm ground. We know that the Intelligence Department advised that the two Republics could put into the field a total force of 59,000 men. We had therefore to deal with an army of 59,000 men, and there was always the chance, which I am afraid the Government did not sufficiently take into account, of a Dutch rising in Cape Colony. Here I cannot help asking hon. Members to contrast the attitude of Mr. Rhodes, the Imperialist, with that of Mr. Schreiner, the Afrikaner, who strove to preserve peace by correcting misrepresentation, and who, since the outbreak of war, has used all his influence to mitigate the hostility of the Cape Dutch and to prevent their joining their forces to those of their brethren in the Transvaal. That conduct on the part of Mr. Schreiner seems to me to be the true

Imperialism, and worthy of the gratitude of this country. I am afraid that sometimes the English people are too apt to be guided by the opinion of Mr. Rhodes on South African affairs. That gentleman has, more than once, shown himself to be profoundly wrong. I do not wish to say much about the raid now. I will simply say that had it not been for Mr. Rhodes there would have been no raid. I will not say that but for the raid there would have been no war, but I do say that that stupendous folly has certainly been one of the chief subsidiary causes that contributed to the war, and has been the element which has told most against us. The British public would be well advised to pay less attention to Mr. Rhodes and not to be led captive by the tinkling phrases of his empirical Imperialism. An army of 59,000 men, equipped and acting in co-operation in their own country, with every advantage such as the Boers possess on their side, ought to have been met by a larger number of troops than a single army corps, unless, indeed, the Government were under the delusion, shared by the War Office and the generals, and, indeed, by the whole country, that one Englishman was able to fight successfully against three of any other nation. That delusion has not been borne out; it has soon been knocked on the head. Warfare is not like politics; armies cannot exist under banners of their own self-glorification. The banners are soon threatened when we come face to face with stern realities. The delusion on this occasion has not been evident since the war began. Since the beginning of October the Government has never ceased to pour reinforcements into South Africa, until we are told that at the end of this month we shall have 180,000 men there. It is said that these forces were sent in dribblets. How else could they be sent? You cannot march an army across the ocean. The men have to be sent in ships, and since the outbreak of war a huge fleet of transports have been engaged in steaming between South Africa and England. It may be that this is good as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. Why was not an army corps sent to South Africa at the time of the conference? The Government have sufficiently answered that. They have said that had we behaved as if war was inevitable it would certainly have vitiated the negotiations. I accept that, but I ask this question, Why were not troops sent out long before the conference? Because, say the Government, our hands were tied by the raid. That is true as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. The Government could not object to any reasonable increase in Mr. Kruger's armaments, but there was a time when the Government could have said to Mr. Kruger, "You are now sufficiently armed to secure yourself against any repetition of the raid. If you continue to arm we shall look upon it as a menace to ourselves, and we on our side shall strengthen our forces in South Africa, so as to secure ourselves against any act of aggression on your part." If they had done that I think the present war would have been avoided. That is a legitimate method of action. What do we do when any other nation increases its fleet? We do the same. What does France or Germany do when the other increases its army? It does the same. We ought to have acted on that principle with President Kruger when we saw that he was turning the Transvaal into an armed camp. I also think that the Government have gone too far in pretending ignorance of what was going on. I do not believe they were ignorant; if they were they certainly ought not to have been. As a matter of fact they could not have been ignorant, because it is a fact that the most formidable item of armament consists in Maxim guns, and Maxim's firm informed the Government of every single Maxim gun despatched by them to South Africa. I am afraid the Government ignored that information, and I should like to see eradicated that tendency to ignore anything that is at all disagreeable or unpleasant. For instance, I do not think it is wise to ignore the present unfriendly attitude of Europe. I do not mean that we should throw ourselves into a state of frantic alarm on that account, but at the same time it is not a thing to be dismissed with a mere shrug of the shoulders. Wise statesmen at such a moment would endeavour to conciliate European opinion by every means in their power; at any rate, they would carefully avoid anything that could embitter it. I should like to see—perhaps we shall see on Monday—some more indication that the Government are aware of the considerable loss of prestige we have suffered in this war. It is absurd to say, as did the

hon. Member for Mayo, that that prestige is irretrievable. It will be retrieved, and before long, but it will have to be retrieved by the proper means, and certainly it will be courting aggression, if not the destruction of our Empire, to imagine that we can afford to run our Empire with the same small army that has hitherto sufficed. You may say what you like, you may skrink from the word and from the thing, but I firmly believe that sooner or later you will have to adopt some form of conscription, or else you will have to diminish your possessions and responsibilities, and play a smaller part in the world. These are lessons I should like the Government to take to heart. The last attitude they should adopt at a time like the present is an attitude of complacency. Whether the Government are to blame or not, there is no question as to the fact that the nation bewails the loss of a number of its bravest soldiers and most promising officers. Much blood has been spilt, and money has been poured out like water. We have had to endure reverses which have touched our pride. We shall have to endure sacrifices which will touch our pocket. But the nation does not falter or hold back; it begrudges neither men nor money. Never was it more eager to do anything required of it, never more determined to snatch victory from the jaws of defeat. But it expects one thing in return. It says to the Government, "Give us a strong lead; let us know your mind; speak out boldly; do not shrink or hesitate or hold back: say what you want, you shall have whatever you ask." But the nation is not in a mood for trifling. When an officer was asked how many troops he required, he replied "5,000." The answer he got to his request was, "Take 12,000, and fail at your peril." That, I feel sure, would be the answer of the nation to the Government, no matter what the request might be. One tremendous fact that we cannot get over is that we are at present at war, and it is our business to bring this war to a speedy and successful conclusion. I cannot see how that business, on which we all agree, is to be promoted by the Amendment before the House. I am a student of the paper associated with the hon. Member for Northampton, and I sometimes find in it most excellent advice. The other week I read in it that no sensible man in his vote in this House should consider the mere wording of a motion; he should also look at the consequences which would follow the carrying of the motion. Those consequences with regard to this Amendment have been dwelt upon ad nauseam, and I am not going to repeat them. We are told that the Opposition are practically divided, and would be utterly unable to take up the task of government if it devolved upon them. But I should like the Government to take higher ground than that. I should like them to say, "You may cavil against us as much as you will, but you have no monopoly of patriotic feeling. Our one object is to secure a speedy, honourable and permanent peace, and compared to that object office is nothing to us. It does not matter in the least whether we or you sit on these benches, but it does matter a great deal that we should bring this war to such a finish as will consolidate and strengthen the Empire, restore peace and prosperity to South Africa, and re-establish our position in the eyes of the world. If you will show that you have men or measures that can secure such a result, we will be glad to accept the one or make room for the other, but if you can produce neither it is your bounden duty to assist us in carrying out the task to which you have confessed yourselves to be unequal." Such an answer would satisfy the country and would be somewhat difficult for the Opposition to meet. Finally, when we have to decide which way to vote, we must think not only of the war but of the peace which is to follow. When the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs asked the Opposition the other day what was their policy, the reply was, "To make peace." There are gentlemen opposite ready to make peace even now, at this particular moment. [An HON. MEMBER: Why not?] We have tried that once before, but the teaching of events has made no impression upon the minds of some hon. Members; they would repeat the same old blunders in the same old way. We have tried the peace which these gentlemen would make, and the taste of it is exceedingly bitter in our mouths. This war, amongst a great many evils, has at least this good, that it will enable this nation to purge its system of peace of that quality for ever. We do want peace, speedy peace, but we do not want such a peace as brings forth war. We want a peace from which spring the fruits of peace—

good government, order, liberty, and justice. There is no doubt that at this present crisis our interests and our duty are perfectly clear. They both run on the same lines, and can best be expressed in the words of Longfellow:—

Cast not back again ;
Go forward ; meet the future
Without fear, and with a manly heart.”

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.) : As an Irish Member I feel it a duty to my countrymen on the other side of the channel to state the grounds on which I differ from some of my colleagues below the gangway, and why I mean to vote for this Amendment. I read this Amendment as bearing a totally different construction from that put upon it by my hon. friend the Member for East Mayo. I look upon it as embodying a censure upon the Government for the want of knowledge, foresight, and judgment displayed in bringing about this war, and after they had betrayed the country into embarking upon this war not being fully prepared for it. I do not look upon this Amendment as necessarily involving any necessity on the part of those who support it to carry on the war to the bitter end. That I regard as a matter for future discussion and consideration, but I think it is the bounden duty of every Member of this House—who must individually partake of the responsibility, more or less, for the course taken in this, the most momentous crisis of the country that has ever occurred—to put on record his protest against the war. I agree with those who have said that this war was unnecessary and unjust, for it is unworthy of the greatest Empire that ever existed to embark upon an expedition for which there is no parallel in ancient or modern history, that of sending out an army of nearly 200,000 men with all its equipments, 7,000 miles from the centre of the Empire in order to cope with two small insignificant republics, the population of which is not as large, I believe, as that of some of our considerable provincial towns in this kingdom. It requires some very strong reasons and some very cogent arguments to justify such a course as that, and a war involving such a loss of life as has already occurred in every rank from the highest to the humblest, and an expenditure which I should be sorry to put at less than £100,000,000 at a time when there is such a great necessity for the expenditure of money in order to relieve the poverty and destitution of the masses of this country. Such a war as this cannot be lightly undertaken, and I will venture to consider what excuses have been afforded by that eloquent speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies, whose war this has been justly stated to be. The Transvaal, by the solemn treaty of 1884, was made an independent State, as independent as any other State in the world, with one simple qualification, namely, that it could not enter into foreign treaties without the consent of the Sovereign. That treaty involved necessarily that the Transvaal was, in all other respects, independent and free. By the Convention of 1884, on every principle of international law and justice, we are bound—and the burden also lies upon the present Government and upon those in their service—to justify the violation of so solemn a compact as that. Now what is the excuse or the pretext offered for such a violation? The object of the Conference at Bloemfontein, and of all those negotiations which occupied so many pages of the Blue-book, was mainly to give a franchise, not merely to the citizens of the Transvaal, but to the Uitlanders, whether Irish, English, German, or people of any other nationality who had gone out there in order to work the mines. This House should never forget the fact that Johannesburg did not come into existence, and the mines were not discovered and put into working order, until after the Convention of 1884. The putting forward of that pretext of the extension of the franchise was a sham and a pretence. Assuming that there was any grievance in the Transvaal; according to international law, a State has no right to interfere with the domestic policy of another country. What would this country say if there was a great agitation for manhood suffrage or any other popular measure of that kind here at home? Would that justify France or Germany in going to war with England for not extending manhood suffrage to all the inhabitants, including the natives of France and Germany who might be living in England? Would it be considered an excusable pretext for a foreign war if, when this Parliament withheld Home Rule from Ireland, any of the European States were to make this a casus belli with England because it was an act of injustice to deny this to the Irish people? It is obvious that no grievance such as the extension of the franchise or the existence of the dynamite monopoly, or any of those complaints made by the English Government, could constitute a legitimate casus belli. If there had been a proper and temperate remonstrance made with President Kruger, and if the course of diplomacy had, instead of being of an exasperating character, as anybody who reads the Blue-book must see it was from the very first inception—if those remonstrances had been couched in the ordinary language of courteous diplomacy I have not the least doubt that President Kruger would have conceded every single point that was put before him in a reasonable manner. He did concede the franchise in a reasonable way, and he declared to the end that he was willing to concede the five years franchise. I do not think gentlemen opposite, who take the opposite view of the conduct of the Transvaal Government in regard to the Uitlanders, exactly understand the question. Of course the franchise could not be given to the Uitlanders unless they became subjects of the Transvaal. There is no such instance in any country of aliens having a right to vote, no matter how long they reside in a place. President Kruger was willing to give a vote after five years residence and good conduct, and that period would have enabled the Uitlanders to obtain letters of naturalisation and also the franchise. Exactly the same law prevails in this country and in Ireland, for aliens here cannot obtain letters of naturalisation until they have been resident for five years in the country. That is the very case of the Uitlanders. Hon. Members opposite talk of equal rights for all whites, and they seem to think that the moment a white man appears in the Transvaal he should have the franchise, and at the same time remain a subject of the British Empire. They claim for the Uitlanders all these advantages in a country in which they have no permanent interest, and from which they will probably emigrate the moment they get sufficient money out of the mines to enable them to return home. Therefore, the idea of the franchise, in my mind, has always been a most unfortunate pretext to put forward, as the ground for picking a quarrel with so quiet and simple-minded a people as the residents of the South African Republic and the Orange Free State. But President

Kruger was willing to give the franchise, and submit to arbitration any legitimate differences that existed between him and this country, and that state of things continued up to the end of September. Consequently the responsibility of this war rests upon the Government. It does not rest upon their generals or upon the Commander-in-chief, but it rests upon the Cabinet, who are the trustees for the public, and the trustees for the safety of the Empire. The Cabinet never formulated, up to what is called Kruger's ultimatum, what were the various demands they were making, and what they required in order to be satisfied. Up to the very last moment, nay, up to this hour in this protracted Debate, we have not yet heard what demands would have satisfied the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for the Colonies. There has been absolutely no statement formulated of the various demands which would have satisfied the Cabinet, and which would have averted this war. The truth of the matter is they were determined to overwhelm President Kruger and to outwit him in diplomacy, and having failed in that they put him in such a position as to leave him no other alternative but to issue an ultimatum. It is absurd to say that the South African Republic were the aggressors in this war, for the negotiations put the Transvaal Government in such a position that they had only two courses to pursue—either they must remain quietly and submissively until the 180,000 British troops were sent out, or else take the course which they did, and that was to invade the colony of Natal. It is exactly as if a burglar had entered your house and was about to shoot you; are you to wait until the burglar shoots, or are you justified in taking such steps as will prevent him getting the better of you? I say it is a mere playing with words to say that the South African Republic were the aggressors in this case. It reminds me of the report of a case which I read in the newspapers where a man had treated his wife in such a manner that she could not live with him, and had to leave the house. The man, when charged with desertion, said he did not desert her, but she deserted him. The judge, however, was too wise to accede to such a suggestion as that, and as the wife had been put in a position which was intolerable to her, the judge ruled that it was not the wife who had deserted the husband, but the husband who had really deserted the wife. I have looked over and over again into this question, and I cannot discover what would have satisfied the Government short of complete submission. Paramountcy has been introduced, but it is clear that there was no paramountcy recognised by the Convention of 1884. It is clear that the Convention of 1884 made the Transvaal an independent state subject to the qualification that they could not enter into foreign treaties without the sanction of our sovereign. I say that was the only difference between the status of this country and the South African Republic, and in every other respect the Transvaal was a separate and independent state. The least that could have been done would have been to have put upon paper in plain and simple language what it was that the Government complained of. The franchise was put plain enough, but there were five or six other things which even up to the 9th of October were not formulated, and what immediately led to the ultimatum was the statement in the previous despatch from the British Government announcing that they were not just yet in a position to put on paper what the other demands were which they made against the South African Republic. Therefore it is, I say, there was a want of knowledge, foresight, and judgment, if there was not something worse, in the whole conduct of the Government in their preliminary negotiations with the South African Republic. I am quite satisfied of this, and although I do not expect any words of mine, or of the ablest and most eloquent orators on this or the other side of the House, to alter the preconceived determination of Gentlemen opposite, I have not the slightest doubt that if some Cabinet Minister had gone out from this country to the Cape, or if we had sent out some Commissioner or Ambassador with plenipotentiary powers, they would have settled in a very short time this war, and this terrible waste of life and treasure would never have sullied the last expiring year of the nineteenth century. My hon. friends below the gangway state that they do not agree with the latter part of the Amendment, but I wish they would reconsider their position. The meaning of the words is that if the Government had made up their minds that war was inevitable, as the Secretary for the Colonies now admits, if the Government knew that then they ought to have taken proper steps, not after the declaration of war but before it, to make sure that it should be brought to a hasty conclusion, and that there should not have been this dreadful waste of life, of happiness, of everything that is dearest and most valued, and this treasure, the loss of which will for ages to come rest upon the people of Great Britain and impede the progress of Liberal legislation, the Government could have avoided this war. The late Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Salisbury went themselves to the Berlin Conference. They did not consider it above them to go to Berlin, and they came back with what they described as "Peace with honour." Why could not the right hon. Gentleman or some of his colleagues have gone out to Pretoria to negotiate with President Kruger such terms as would secure to the Uitlanders every right and privilege to which they were entitled, and then come back and announce to this Parliament that they had settled once and for all the South African trouble? There was no such effort as that made, and the correspondence of the Government was couched in the most insulting terms, and this correspondence was backed up by the insulting speech of the Colonial Secretary at Highbury. Such a tone as that was not calculated to reconcile the Government of the Transvaal, who were naturally suspicious and afraid of being overpowered, as it were, by the big brother of the British Empire. That was not the course to pursue if peace had been the object, but I believe war was the object. We ought never to have had this war at all, for it will leave a stain upon our name. It has already carried mourning into many homes, from the noblest and highest to the poorest peasant in the remotest districts of Ireland. It is a war which will be written in blood upon the pages of English history in the present generation, a stain which will never be effaced for generations and generations to come.

*Tuesday, 6th February, 1900.RETURNS, REPORTS, &c.*PUBLIC ACCOUNTS AND CHARGES ACT, 1891.

Treasury minute, dated 26th January, 1900, directing, in pursuance of Section 2 (3) of the Public Accounts and Charges Act, 1891, that where any sum is by order of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland under section 80 (2) of the Local Government (Ireland) Act, 1898, deducted from moneys payable from the Local Taxation (Ireland) Account to any Council in respect of a debt due from such Council, and where the amount due from the Council would, if paid in ordinary course, have been applied as an Appropriation-in-Aid of the Vote for the Royal Irish Constabulary, the sum deducted in lieu thereof shall be similarly applied as an Appropriation-in-Aid of that Vote.

SUPERANNUATION.

Treasury minute, dated 31st January, 1900, declaring that Samuel Nevitt, viewer, Royal Small Arms Department, War Office Department, was appointed without a Civil Service certificate through inadvertence on the part of the head of the department.

Laid before the House (pursuant to Act), and ordered to lie on the Table.

THE VACCINATION ACTS.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY): My Lords, I rise to present a Petition from the Guardians of the Poor of the Wandsworth and Clapham Union, in the County of London, praying that the provisions of the Vaccination Acts may be amended, and that it may not be in the power of vaccination officers to institute proceedings under the Acts at the expense of the rates without first obtaining the sanction of the Guardians. The Petition is respectfully worded, and, though I entirely disagree with its object, there is no reason why I should not present it to your Lordships.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—THE IMPERIAL YEOMANRY — SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF CHAPLAINS.

*EARL EGERTON: My Lords, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will reconsider his decision not to appoint any chaplains to the Imperial Yeomanry; and whether he will, in the first instance, attach a chaplain to the Imperial Yeomanry Hospital of 500 beds, which has received the sanction of the War Office, and is being established at Capetown. I ask this question as an old Yeomanry officer of thirty years standing, and I may say that I have sent a contingent from my own estate in the Yeomanry Force which has just left these shores. I understand that the War Office handed over to a committee of Yeomanry officers the duty of raising and equipment of the Yeomanry force. That I believe they have done very successfully. In the very short space of a month they have turned out a force of 5,000 men, mounted or ready to be mounted, and I believe there are others of equal force ready as soon as the equipment is prepared for them. But when the Yeomanry Committee had offers from clergymen who were anxious to serve as chaplains in South Africa, and when they had submitted to them the names of two or three chaplains as fit and proper persons to act for the Yeomanry, the Adjutant General sent an unconditional refusal to allow any chaplains to go out. I understand, from a communication the War Office was good enough to send to me, that one of the reasons why they were not so appointed was that the Yeomanry are to be attached to different divisions or brigades and are to have the benefit of the chaplains of those divisions or brigades. That, no doubt, from a military point of view is very satisfactory, but there is a feeling in the country that the Yeomanry, having been sent out, should have some special chaplain to look after their spiritual needs. It is not merely a military question, but it is one of principle, and is also, as some think, one of sentiment. Therefore I think I may fairly ask that the Yeomanry should be considered not merely as an integral part of the Army, but as a special force sent out under special circumstances, with a staff of their own, and that their claim to have a special chaplain attached to them ought to be recognised. I can see that it would be impossible to appoint chaplains to all the units of the regiments in South Africa, but the suggestion I venture to make is that there should be someone, when they land in South Africa, to attend to their spiritual wants, and told off for the Yeomanry, and who, if necessary, should be attached to the Yeomanry Hospital which has been founded so liberally by the gifts of friends at home. I think it is not unreasonable to ask that something of that kind should be done. Lord Roberts has, I understand, stated that there are sufficient chaplains in South Africa already, but in my opinion the percentage of chaplains to the men is not large, especially when you consider the accidents of war and the various duties a chaplain has, under the circumstances, to perform. I do not know whether any actual addition to the number of chaplains is contemplated to be made to meet the wants of the forces to be sent out, but I hope that one chaplain at least may be attached to the Yeomanry in the way I have indicated in my question. I feel certain that if that is done it will give great satisfaction to the Yeomanry force which has been raised in the most rapid and loyal way to meet a great emergency, and I trust that the War Office will reconsider the absolute refusal they have given, and entertain some proposal such as I have ventured to suggest.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): My Lords, in a matter of this sort nothing would be more agreeable to me than to meet the wishes of the Imperial Yeomanry, to whose patriotism the noble Lord has referred in terms not at all too eulogistic. But the difficulty of carrying out his suggestion is a practical one. It is this, that the Imperial Yeomanry will not be employed as a distinct and separate force of mounted men, but they will be distributed amongst the various brigades. Therefore, it is impossible for any one chaplain to minister to the whole force. I am afraid if a chaplain were designated for that exclusive purpose he would very probably find himself, wherever he was, in the position of having no congregation of Yeomen to minister to. The noble Lord referred more particularly to the Yeomanry hospital which has been so generously equipped for the care of the sick and wounded men belonging to the Yeomanry. In regard to that I am glad to say that it has been found possible to make an arrangement which, I think, meets his suggestion. A chaplain has been designated particularly to attend to that hospital. The noble Lord was quite correct in saying that Lord Roberts had, a few days ago, expressed his opinion that the supply of chaplains was already sufficient. We had asked him whether it was desirable to send out any more. Since that intimation was received from Lord Roberts five clergymen who had offered their services as chaplains have been accepted.

THE IMPERIAL YEOMANRY—TRANSPORT.

VISCOUNT GALWAY: My Lords, before asking the question standing in my name, as to the transport of the Imperial Yeomanry to the Cape, may I be allowed to mention, as one who had advocated the claims of the Yeomanry for many years, the great satisfaction it gave the Yeomanry force to be called upon to take their share in the defence of the Empire abroad? The Yeomanry force some years ago was threatened with extinction, but, despite every discouragement, we persevered and endeavoured to make ourselves more efficient every year. We kept up our organisation, and the result has been that when an appeal came we were able to answer it in what I hope the noble Marquess will agree has been a highly satisfactory manner. In view of what has been said in the country I think it is only fair that I should state that the companies which have been sent out comprise thoroughly qualified horsemen and certified marksmen. While nobody grudges the unstinted praise which has been given to all our colonies, who have so loyally come to our assistance, I think one word from those in authority of commendation of the patriotic spirit displayed by the Yeomanry and the Volunteers would have the result of greatly encouraging us in our efforts. I am not raising this as a personal matter, because the company I sent out left England ten days ago, but I desire to call attention to the disappointment which is felt by the Yeomanry on account of the delay in conveying them to the front. This delay causes not only great disappointment to the men, but also entails heavy expense upon those connected with the force. I desire to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is correct that no further Yeomanry will leave for the Cape for another three weeks, and to urge upon him the desirability of expediting the sending out of this force to the front.

THE EARL OF CORK: My Lords, before the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War answers the question which has just been put, I wish entirely to endorse the remarks of my noble friend as to the great disappointment with which the Yeomanry heard the announcement that they would not leave for the Cape for another three weeks. I can speak more positively of the west of England, but there are a great many companies in many parts of England who have been mobilised for three weeks or a month. Most of them have been billeted in towns, and cannot, therefore, be in such a satisfactory condition as if they were quartered in barracks. I hope the noble Marquess will be able to assure us that the delay will not be as long as three weeks, and that he will do all he can to hasten the transport of the Yeomanry Regiments, or, at all events, that pending their embarkation steps will be taken to provide accommodation in barracks for those companies which are at present billeted in many parts of England.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, the position in regard to the embarkation of the Imperial Yeomanry is as follows:—Ships have been already allotted for 3,000 men and 2,000 horses, and the whole will have embarked by the 11th of this month. I am afraid it will be at least a fortnight before we can expect another embarkation to take place. I will certainly do all I can to expedite matters, but my noble friend must be aware that the provision of horse ships is not a very simple or easy matter. I am very sorry that there should have been any disappointment in the case of the companies to which he and the noble Earl opposite have referred, but I am afraid that the disappointment was inevitable. I may, perhaps, tell the House briefly what the procedure is with regard to the provision of transports. The Yeomanry Committee, to whom reference has already been made this evening, reports to the War Office from time to time the number of companies likely to be ready to embark on a given date. The War Office then at once places itself in communication with the Admiralty. In the case of the companies who have been referred to this evening, the Yeomanry Committee advised us on the 29th of January that a certain number of companies would be ready to embark on the 8th February. My noble friend will, I am sure, admit that the margin of time was not a very liberal one, but I think something might have been done for them had it not been that at that very moment we had to ask the Admiralty to find ships for the cavalry brigade which had been ordered at rather short notice to go to South Africa. That absorbed all the available ships, with the result, I am afraid, that several companies of Yeomanry who had been looking forward to an early start for the seat of war were greatly disappointed. I deeply regret the disappointment to those companies, but, as I said before, I am afraid it could scarcely be avoided under the circumstances. I think I have told my noble friend all I have to say about the matter. He expressed a wish that some word of encouragement should be spoken on the part of Her Majesty's Government showing how greatly we appreciate the manner in which this call for assistance from the Yeomanry has been met. I have already said this evening how deeply we appreciate it; and I can assure my noble friend that this is the feeling of my colleagues, and that we do very readily acknowledge the obligations under which we are to the force with which my noble friend has been so long connected.

House adjourned at a quarter before Five of the clock, to Thursday next, Two of the clock.

GREAT SOUTHERN AND WESTERN AND WATERFORD, LIMERICK, AND WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANIES' AMALGAMATION BILL.

On the Report by the CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS upon these Bills (Nos. 49 and 50 in the above list) :—

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): As I understand, in accordance with the usual practice, the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees, who is always most careful in desiring to meet the wishes of private Members at all times, has arranged for the Irish Railway Amalgamation Bills to originate in the Upper House. I presume he did not know of the strong feeling which existed in this quarter of the House, and I may say among Irish Members generally, that they should first be considered in the House of Commons. Under the old practice when a Bill has been rejected once in this House it is, if reintroduced, taken first in another place. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not think I am complaining when I say that there is in Ireland an extremely strong feeling with regard to these Amalgamation Bills, for and against. Personally, I am rather in favour, but a number of my colleagues are against them, and we all think that an opportunity should be given in the House of Commons where alone Ireland is democratically represented, to deal first with the first of these two Bills. It has already been before two Committees—one a hybrid Committee, and I would ask the Chairman of Committees whether some means cannot be devised so that this House may have the first opportunity of passing an opinion upon these Bills, which are of far more importance to us than they are to the English or Scotch people. I gather from him that he has in his own mind some idea that the Bills might be considered by a Joint Committee. On that I would not like now to express an opinion, but I certainly do hope that on a matter of such vital importance to three provinces of Ireland as these amalgamation Bills he will consider favourably the views we put before him.

MR. SPEAKER : There is no question to which the hon. Member can address himself.

MR. T. M. HEALY : I thought I might stop the presentation of the Report.

MR. SPEAKER : I think I ought to say that the Standing Order 79 as it at present stands states that the division of Bills between the Lords and the Commons is to be assigned to the Chairmen of Committees of the two Houses, who are to determine which Bills shall be introduced in each House. Therefore, the House has delegated the power to determine which Bills shall be introduced in this House and in the other House to the Chairmen of Committees, and their decision upon that point is final, and the House cannot as the Standing Order stands at present determine the course to be taken. It is open to the hon. Member to move to amend the Standing Order, but until the Standing Order is dealt with his only course is by way of private appeal to the Chairmen of Committees to deal with Bills in a particular way.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Perhaps I would be in order in asking the Chairman if he will reconsider the matter before we put down a motion to amend the Standing Orders ?

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (MR. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith) : I am afraid that any reconsideration of the matter would not lead to any alteration of the decision to which the Lords' Chairman and myself have come. We have carefully considered the question, and we consider that the Amalgamation Bills should originate this session in the House of Lords. Last session the Bills were referred to a hybrid Committee, which, I may point out without casting any reflection on that body, carried on its business in a way which gave results far from satisfactory to all the parties concerned. The matter was so long delayed that we had to discuss it quite at the end of the session, which I think was not generally satisfactory. It is thought that in this session it would be better that the Bills should originate in the other House. But with a view to, if possible, saving expense to all parties, the Lords Chairman and myself think it may be well to follow a precedent—an old one perhaps—set in the year 1873, when two English railway amalgamation Bills were referred to a Joint Committee. If that finds favour with hon. Gentlemen opposite, we should possibly be able to devise some means by which this Bill, although originating in the other House, would be referred to a Joint Committee of the two Houses, which would result in a strong Committee considering this very important question, and would also have the effect that great expense would be saved, both to the promoters and the opponents of the Bill. It is true that at the last moment there was put into my hands a resolution, unanimously passed by the Nationalist Members of this House. But I am afraid it would be impossible for the Lords Chairman and myself to give effect to the resolution in its entirety. According to Standing Orders, the discretion is vested in us as to how Bills are to originate, and I do not think, unless the House chooses to amend the Standing Order, that we should set aside that discretion which is vested in us.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford) : I just wish to make one observation as to the proposal to refer this Bill to a Committee of the two Houses. I think it may be a very valuable suggestion. I wish to point out that the supporters and the opponents are at one in wishing the Bill to originate in this House, and I therefore hope the hon. Gentleman will let the matter stand until we can submit a communication to him.

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER : I shall be happy to consider any communication the hon. Member may hand to me.
